As regards the carbon matter, Montana, one seldom ever finds anything but 110 or 220 volts nowadays. However, I do not see why 90 or 118 volts should act materially different from 110, since there is ample resistance for the arc cushion, even with 90 volts, and in any case the voltage at the arc will be the same, the resistance taking up the difference between the line and arc voltage. It is true that projection in the West was, and even now, perhaps, is better than projection in the East, viewed as a whole. Just why this should be so, I cannot say, except that I believe that moving picture theater managers of the West are, perhaps, taken as a body, considerably better posted in projection than is the Eastern exhibitor, and not so easily satisfied with poor curtain results. I will say, however, that projection in the East is rapidly improving. There is a very marked difference in projection in New York City now and a year ago, a very marked difference, indeed. One year ago it was an exceedingly difficult matter to find projection in New York City which could not be liberally criticised, or roundly roasted. Now, however, it is not at all a difficult matter to find projection that is quite passably fair, and some of it very good, indeed. It is to be hoped and I believe will prove the fact that one year hence New York City can show projection equal to that of any other city in the country.

Lengthening the Focus.—Mr. L. R. Cordray, Orville, O., writes: "Every time I look at the Moving Picture World I see something which adds to my knowledge of the business. Since writing you last I have moved my screen back 3½ feet, thus making my throw 64 ft. The picture is now too large. I do not want to move my curtain up much since as it now is the warm air has a chance to go out over and around the curtain, thus helping to keep the house cool. Is there any way that I can reduce the picture (now 11½ ft.x15½) to 10x12 ft. without buying a new lens? Enclosed find photo of the front of our house, which is the only theater in this town. The house is 100 feet long, including the stage, and is about 30 ft. wide; we seat 259. When Mr. Klink, Canton, O., 24 miles east of us, says he has the best operating room in this neck of the woods, I believe he is mistaken, because I have one that any operator might be proud of, and it is kept as clean as the front room of your home. I will have a photo of it in the near future and you can see for yourself that it is as I say. I find your Handbook very instructive and well worth the money I paid for it."

The photo sent shows a very neat front; a very neat front, indeed, for a small house. I am sorry that it is in colors, hence cannot be reproduced successfully. As to the lens, you might try out one of the combinations and have the barrel of the lens lengthened say ¼ inch. Any machinist can make a ring to screw in and lengthen the barrel. The chances are the experiment will not be successful, and then again it may. You cannot always tell what you can do with a lens. At any rate, you will only be out the amount charged for making the extension ring. Klink, however, your exchange will trade lenses with you, taking yours in exchange for one of the proper size. They ought to, at any rate. When I was managing an exchange myself I accommodated customers in that way and there is no reason in the world why an exchange should not be made, provided your lens is in good condition and the exchange has a second-hand lens of proper focal length. We shall be glad, indeed, to have a photograph of your operating room; in fact, I would be glad to publish photographs of operating rooms if they are sent in. I would suggest that you and Mr. Klink might well exchange visits.

Low Wages.—Cuero, Tex., writes: "The Trouble Department has been a great source of aid to me as an operator. I believe if more of the operators would read it there would be less of those half-lighted pictures, and we would have more really competent men. This part of the country is by no means good for the operator. He must enter into competition with a lot of 15-year-old kids; or, at least, that is the trouble in San Antonio. I do not know of an operator in San Antonio who is receiving more than $10 a week. True, they are not worth more than that sum, but a real operator cannot get a position there, unless he wishes to accept that sum. I have been a little more lucky and have been getting $15 a week, but I also do card work and sign painting. I have been told that I am worth more than that but I cannot get it on account of the number of kid operators. One trouble is there is no union here or anywhere near here. If you can give me the address of some union, I don't care if it is ten thousand miles away, just so it is a union, I will immediately get in communication with them. I know of but one union man in this part of the country, and he is the operator and manager of the Dreamland. I should like to see what you have to say as regards this kind of a proposition. I have a copy of your Handbook and it is the best yet. I would not be without it if I could not get another just like it. I have been operating for some four or five years and still I find the book a source of much help."

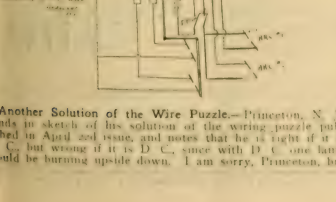
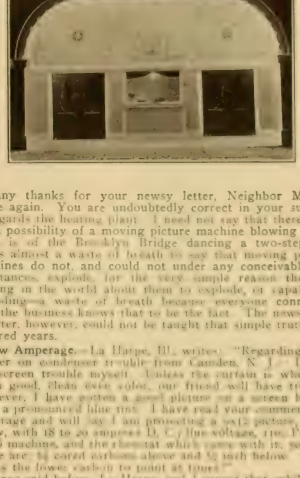
If the operators there are all young boys working for $10 a week, it seems to me that it would be almost impossible to form an effective union with that kind of material. I do not know what the nearest union to you is, but believe if you address a letter to the President of the Moving Picture Operators' Union, Labor Temple, Kansas City, Mo., it will reach the Kansas City Operators' Union. I would put a special delivery stamp on it. I do not think there is any operators' union either in Ft. Worth, Dallas or any other Texas cities. Kansas City or St. Louis would probably be as close as any union there is. You could also write Mr. H. G. Woods, President San Francisco Moving Picture Operators' Union, 68 Haight Street, San Francisco, Cal. It is an amazing thing to me that managers will make the income of their house dependent upon the work of a $10 boy. Box office receipts depend absolutely upon what comes from the end of the lens in the operating room, and it is not to be expected that a boy or man working for $10 a week is going to put the necessary intelligence, care and brains into his work to produce high class projection. It is not in the nature of things that he should do so. To my mind, the manager who hires an operator for $10 a week is simply doing his level best to kill the goose that lays the golden egg.

The Wire Puzzle.—Many replies to the wire puzzle, published in April 22 issue, have been received. Most of them were correct, though many solved as per Friend Morgan's diagram failed to make mention of the fact that with D. C. one lamp would burn upside down unless its wires were switched. Morgan was himself at fault in that particular. The diagrams selected for reproduction will serve to illustrate. The solution of Friend Carr, who submitted the puzzle, is mislaid but, as I recollect, it was essentially the same as that of Brother Reith. Such little problems as this, provided they are really practical questions, are excellent. They sharpen the wits by causing one to study and to evolve solutions of difficult questions.



Another Solution of the Wire Puzzle.—Princeton, N. J., sends in sketch of his solution of the wiring puzzle published in April 22nd issue, and notes that he is right if it is D. C., but wrong if it is D. C., since with D. C. one lamp would be burning upside down. I am sorry, Princeton, but you have not got the thing quite right. By your plan you would, as a matter of fact, only be using one rheostat. Study the other diagrams submitted. Better luck next time.

A Newsy Letter.—Mr. Jas. Martin, Spencer, Ia., writes: "Enclosed find picture of the new Palm Theater at Missouri Valley, opened February 8th by Pratt Bros. Mr. Charles Pratt is manager. Apparently the new place is enjoying ample patronage, proving that the people appreciate Mr. Pratt's efforts to please. Mr. C. A. Morley, Waterloo, Ia., purchased the Scenic Theater at Storm Lake, Ia., from Mr. Geo. Sterg last week. The house will be remodeled at once. Just had word that the Magic Theater at Rockwell City had an accident. Will give you the details as the newspaper has it, though that version does not seem possible or, at least, probable. It is as follows: 'Mr. A. L. Dean, janitor Magic Theater, Rockwell City, was probably fatally injured Monday night, being blown from the building by the explosion of the moving picture machine. Cause of explosion unknown.' I visited the Magic Theater recently and it had a steel lined operating room; the manager of the theater was also manager of the city electric light plant. I see no reason for the place having gas tanks of any kind and am inclined to believe it was the heating plant that blew up. The fire which followed the explosion completely destroyed the theater."



Many thanks for your newsy letter, Neighbor Martin. Come again. You are undoubtedly correct in your surmise as regards the heating plant. I need not say that there is as much possibility of a moving picture machine blowing up as there is of the Brooklyn Bridge dancing a two-step. It seems almost a waste of breath to say that moving picture machines do not, and could not under any conceivable circumstances, explode, for the very simple reason there is nothing in the world about them to explode, or capable of exploding—a waste of breath because everyone connected with the business knows that to be the fact. The newspaper reporter, however, could not be taught that simple truth in a hundred years.

Low Amperage.—La Harpe, Ill., writes: "Regarding your answer on condenser trouble from Camden, N. J.: I have had screen trouble myself. Unless the curtain is white, or has a good, clean even color, our friend will have trouble. However, I have gotten a good picture on a screen having quite a pronounced blue tint. I have read your comments on amperage and will say I am projecting a 1x1½ picture, 65 ft. throw, with 18 to 20 amperes D. C. line voltage, 110. Powers No. 6 machine, and the rheostat which came with it, 50 volts at the arc, 14 carat carbons above and 12 inch below. What causes the lower carbon to point at times?"

I have said before, La Harpe, and I repeat that, while you may get a fair picture with low amperage, there is room for a wide difference of opinion as to what constitutes good light. What satisfies you, my dear boy, might not satisfy me, or vice versa. If you are really using that low amperage the probable reason for your carbon pointing would be by reason of the carbon having a binder of such poor quality that it disintegrates and allows the carbon particles to fall apart

"The Other Man"

The successful motion picture portrays life as it really is. It often happens in real life that "His Wife" is followed by "The Other Man." Even so in Picturedom. Last Wednesday we released "His Wife," just the sort of a pictorial pippin that "The Other Man" would follow. With no claim to tragic distinction, no pretention to comedy or drama, "The Other Man" stands out as a foto-play of quality and individuality. Picture to yourself a series of charmingly enacted and splendidly photographed scenes, dominated by unflagging interest and ending with a novel climax, and you'll begin to form an idea of what this Nestor production is like. "The Other Man" is the right man—it is also the right picture to have and to feature on your program. Get It!

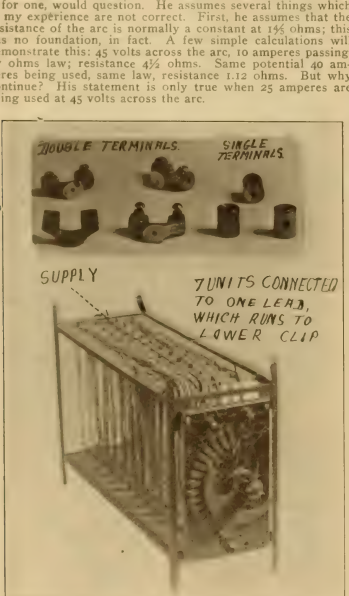
before being consumed. The carbon making bad contact with the holder will also induce pointing since it increases heating. Clean holder contacts with a file.

Gas Generators.—Mr. J. Hamilton, 529 Stockholm Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "Will you please advise me which would be the best, a gas generator or have calcium tanks shipped? I am working one-night stands and always had calcium sent. I believe, however, there should be a better way. If you think the gas generator best, kindly let me know where the best one can be had."

I think it will be conceded by all but the manufacturers of gas generating outfits that the gas tanks give the best general results. They are, however, considerably more expensive. One who thoroughly understands the handling of the gas generating outfits can get very good results, and some get results almost equal to the tank gas. I have given your full address in order that makers of gas outfits may supply you with descriptive matter of their apparatus. The Enterprise Optical Company and the Edison outfits are both good. In fact, they are, to all intents and purposes, essentially the same in results.

Some Exceedingly Interesting Data.—Mr. Geo. M. Pringle, St. Paul, Minn., writes: "In the issue of March 11, page 533, in an article on resistance you invite discussion. Resisto's calculations are of course, correct, but the basis for them I, for one, would question. He assumes several things which in my experience are not correct. First, he assumes that the resistance of the arc is normally a constant at 1½ ohms; this has no foundation, in fact. A few simple calculations will demonstrate this: 45 volts across the arc, 10 amperes passing, by ohms law; resistance 4½ ohms. Same potential 40 amperes being used, same law, resistance 1.12 ohms. But why continue? His statement is only true when 25 amperes are being used at 45 volts across the arc.



"Description of 22-Unit Rheostat.

"The variable resistance of the arc is due to the following facts: You are doubtless familiar with the statement that it requires a potential of 5,000 volts to jump an air gap of ¼ inch (the length of arc in ordinary practice). As we only have from 45 to 60 volts across the arc, its power of jumping is limited and there must be some conductor to carry the current across. The enormous heat of the arc is sufficient to vaporize the carbons. This vapor has a low power of conductivity. When a low amperage is used the column of vapor is quite small and the resistance high, but increase the amperage, the cross section of the stream of vapor is increased and its resistance diminished. Therefore, in fact, the resistance of the arc automatically adjusts itself to the amperage used.

"I have lately built a rheostat (photo enclosed) of 22 units; each unit has a resistance of 20 ohms and will deliver when heated 2.8 amperes to the unit. The units are cut in parallel by means of a sliding contact. We can increase or diminish current at 2.8 ampere steps, and for the past two months have been experimenting to get the best possible light; of course, this is 'booth practice,' but under the best conditions. We have a Weston ammeter and voltmeter. The same has been tested and compared with another to eliminate possible error. We have reached the following results: Current is D. C., line voltage 114, picture 16.8 inches wide; machine, Powers No. 6; throw, 96 ft.; voltage across arc 54: ⅝ Bio upper, ½ Electra lower, 40 amperes, light good; ¾ Bio upper, ½ Electra lower, 50 amperes, light better; ⅞ Bio upper, ⅝ Electra, hard, lower, 60 amperes, light excellent. Examination of stubs of carbons shows the following results: ⅝ carbon crater is 19/64ths across and 12/64ths deep; ¾ carbon crater is 26/64ths across and 16/64ths deep; ⅞ carbon crater is 30/64ths across and 20/64ths deep. I do not wish to be quoted as saying that you cannot use greater amperage than the above, but from our experience that is the maximum with which steady arc can be maintained. We also find that the pressure across the arc averages, with slight fluctuations, 54 volts, whether the amperage is 40 or 60, thus proving out Ohm's law that the resistance of the arc varies. We also found by using a ¾ carbon on 36 amps, diameter of crater was 21/64ths inch and depth was 12/64ths inch; this shows that the current strength regulates the size of a crater. I note with satisfaction an article by Henry Phelps Gage, February 25th, page 411; Table 2, evidently rheostat control voltage, in one case 51 and the other 56. Table 3, rectifyer voltage 55 and 57. On page 410 is the statement that the arc will not work on more than 40 amperes, a conclusion that I came to and so stated in a former letter, January 7th, page 25, but I qualified it with ⅝ carbon.

"No. 3 copper wire supply runs from binding post across center, with soldered leads to each side, connecting with single terminal, down one coil 19.6-inch long, across double terminal, up the other coil same length to single terminal; asbestos covered wire to spring brass clip connecting with sliding contact to the other binding post. As I only used 16 of the 22 units the ends to the right are soldered to the same lead and run to the bottom clip. Each unit consists of two single terminals, one double terminal and two coils of No. 20 Climax, each 19.6-inch long. Total length of resistance in each unit is 39 feet. The wire is wound in a spiral ½ inch in diameter. The covers are off to show construction. Measurements over all: width, 9-inch, height, 17-inch, length, 25-inch. Frame is made of ½ by ½ steel angle bar; top and bottom is ¼ inch; weight with covers 28 pounds. In commenting on my former letter you imply that I had in mind that the arc resistance was greater at 50 amperes than at 40 or 30; no, it is less. But what I did intend was that you could not maintain a steady arc at the higher amperage; of course, you can force 80 or 90 amperes across a ⅝ carbon, but they must be in contact. I have never yet been able to get any practical results from such a state of affairs. I will now offer you a possible explanation of the incandescence of the arc. As I find, by consulting my tables, the resistance of a piece of carbon is very small, the trim ordinarily used being about .001 of an ohm, but the arc itself has a resistance nearly equal to the rheostat. In the latter it is spread over a long section of wire especially designed to cool rapidly, but in the arc it is confined to the cross-section of the crater.

"Try the following experiment with your arc burning steadily at say 40 amperes; freeze your carbons and you will note that your ammeter will register from 60 to 90 amperes, depending on how good a contact you get. Notwithstanding that the rheostat is supposed to hold the current at 40 amperes (you will also get the same result when you first strike the arc), all this current is there at the arc struggling to get across and it is like a river flowing placidly along and suddenly confined to a narrow gorge. By a close examination of the craters of the carbons used on different amperages, I have reached the conclusion that the current is discharged from the crater of the upper carbon (on D. C.) and as the amperage is increased the crater becomes larger and deeper. My reason for thinking that the current flows in that direction is that, in our case at least, we have a 3-wire system and the lamp that these tests were made with is connected as follows: The upper carbon is connected with the positive side and the lower carbon with the neutral and the neutral is grounded by the company on all the D. C. circuits. Under a separate cover I am sending you stubs of ¾ carbons burned at 20, 40 and 50 amperes; also two lower hard ½ inch, burned at 50 amperes; when the lower carbon burns in this shape the light is at its best, but we are unable to get this shape with less than 50 amperes, using ¾ top and ½ bottom. Resisto's first assumption leads to his worst error. As I understand it, he implies that if you connect an arc between two supply wires you will only get 60 amperes. This should be corrected in bold type to prevent some embryo operator from trying it; should he do so (and be fused with a piece of copper wire, as is sometimes the case) he would have on his hands a Fourth of July celebration that he would never forget."

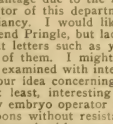
We are very much obliged to you, indeed, Neighbor Pringle, for submitting the results of your experiments. One thing demonstrated I would like to call particular attention to, and that is that good light—really good light—is only had with comparatively heavy amperage. I have always maintained and contended that good projection light is a practical impossibility with 25 amperes of current, except where the picture is very small. I know that many operators disagree with me on this point. I think, however, the disagreement is due to the fact that their idea of good light and mine is radically different. Of course, the fact must be taken into consideration that there are certain disadvantages where the crater becomes very large. The ideal light is a point, hence the smaller the crater the better it is theoretically; practically, however, the disadvantage due to the large crater is, in the judgment of the editor of this department, far more than offset by added brilliancy. I would like to comment on your letter in detail, Friend Pringle, but lack of space forbids. I can assure you that letters such as yours are welcome. I wish we had more of them. I might add that the carbon butts submitted were examined with interest. The form of the craters is ideal. Your idea concerning the cause of crater incandescence is, at least, interesting and quite worthy of study. I think if any embryo operator tried the experiment of connecting-in carbons without resistance, at the same time having the fuses boosted with copper, he would not forget the experience in a hurry. I think I pointed out in my comments on Resisto's article that when the carbons were brought together in an attempt to strike the arc the flow of current would, while the carbons were in contact, be practically unlimited. I might add also that I have worked D. C. arc of 45 amperes successfully on ¾ carbons; that is ¾ above and ½ to the bottom. From this amperage I secured a brilliant white light and an absolutely even, beautiful illumination of an 18-ft. picture.

Information Wanted.—W. D. Eccleston, Bayshore, L. I., writes: "I am new at the picture business, though manager of the Opera House at Bayshore, which seats 800 people. I should like a few pointers. My picture is 15x18 feet; 60 ft. throw. I do not get a good, clear light all over the picture, the corners are dark and shadowy. I use a Fort Wayne compensar. Have 20, 30 and 60-cycle power. A run at 40 amps. If I put it at 60 I get a good light, but it burns my lamp and eats up the carbon. I do not like to run over 40. I should like to find a first class combination piano player and singer. Can you help me?"



You are mistaken, friend Eccleston, in supposing that the compensare switch has anything to do with current cycles. The cycle is the term used to designate the space of time occupied by two alternations of the current. The compensare switch controls the amperage. At one contact you get 20 amperes, at another 30 and at the last one 60. If you cannot get the light on 40, boost it up to 60. Of course, it eats up carbons, but when it comes to a question of a little more carbon or a poor light, I think we had better burn the carbons. As to its heating your lamp, well, that cannot be helped. My advice to you is to use the 60 amperes contact unless you can get good light on 40, which I can tell you before hand you will not be able to do on an 18 ft. picture. As to the piano player and singer I would suggest you write to F. C. Taylor Booking Agency, 51 West 28th Street, New York City. They will probably be able to fix you up. The motion picture Handbook, published by the Moving Picture World, contains much valuable information, and is worth many times it price which is $1.50. You will also do well to send for all back numbers of the Trouble Department (formerly the "Operators' Column"), which began about one year ago.

Lecture Films, Etc.—C. Williams, Winchester, Ind., writes: "Kindly give me the names of some one moving picture film subject from two to five reels, something a man could travel with and lecture on; something the people are interested in, such as Biblical, historical, Panama Canal, etc. Also where can I get lantern slides on places of interest, such as the canal, etc.?"

The only five-reel subject I can think of at this time, Friend Williams, is the "Life of Moses," by the Vitagraph Company. There is a Panama Canal film in existence but I have been unable to ascertain who owns it. Possibly Mr. Lyman J. Howe, Wilkes-Barre, Pa., can inform you. The Kleine Optical Company, 52 State Street, Chicago, issues a complete catalogue of educational, religious and other simliar subjects. Write and get it is my advice. The McIntosh Stereopticon Company, Chicago, Ill., can fix you up in anything you wish in the way of stereopticon slide sets.

Engine Power.—Illinois (name of town suppressed) writes: "Kindly advise me as to the following: The ordinary estimate of engine power is five amperes or ten 16 c.p. 110-volt lamps to each unit of horse power; hence, a five horse-power engine would pull 25 amperes fifty 16 c.p. 110-volt lamps. The approximate voltage of projection arcs is 50. Will it be possible to run a 50-ampere, 50-volt generator with the same power; also would it be necessary to use any resistance in circuit with the arc?"

To find the h.p. being developed by an engine, and expended in electrical energy, multiply the amperes by the volts and divide by 746, the result being the h.p. developed, no account being taken of loss through mechanical and electrical friction. Twenty-five amperes at 110 volts is 2,750 watts, while 50 amperes at 50 volts would be 2,500 watts; showing about ½ horse-power in favor of the 50-volt proposition. You cannot, however, run without some resistance. You could conserve power by using a 60-volt dynamo, but that is as low in pressure as you could go. You will find this matter discussed in a recent issue of the department, reasons being given why an arc cannot be handled without resistance in circuit.

Good Projection Wins.—Mr. F. L. Andrews, Dixon, Tenn., renews his subscription, orders a Handbook and writes: "Have just opened a house in this city; projection equipment is Powers No. 6 and Fort Wayne compensarc. Use a high class piano and good singer. That and moving pictures are all there is to it, but we certainly have got the real thing in pictures. There was a house here last winter which went broke through junk and poor projection. Everyone said I would fail and the first week I didn't make expenses. Now, however, the only trouble is I haven't enough room to accommodate the business. If the Handbook does me as much good as the department has there won't be words strong enough to express my appreciation."

Glad to know you have succeeded, Friend Andrews. I might add that good projection always wins, if backed up by reasonably capable management—not sometimes, mind you, but always.

Condenser Size.—Mr. F. C. Barron, Biglow, Ark., sends $1.50 for Handbook and asks what size condenser should be used for a 13 ft. picture, 50 ft. throw, Model B, calcium gas outfit.

Two 6½ or one 6½ and one 7½, whichever gives you the best results.

Information Wanted.—Mr. M. A. Blodgett, 427 Wilkinson Street, Syracuse, N. Y., writes: "Kindly advise me as to the best way to secure facts and figures as regards the moving picture show business in the State of Florida and Saskatchewan, Alberta, etc. I wish to open a show either in Florida or in the Northwest Provinces in some good live town or city. Some population or more. How would I go about finding the population of the town and other such information, whether there is already a picture show there or not? Kindly advise me in the enclosed envelope."

I have given your full address so that anyone possessing the information can write you direct. I would suggest that you can ascertain the population of the towns from an up to date Rand-McNally atlas. Such an atlas, covering any State in the United States, or I believe any Province of Canada, can be obtained by addressing the Rand-McNally Company, Chicago, Ill. I believe they are 25 cents for each State or Province, though possibly it may be 50 cents. You will then have a select list of towns and write to each one. If you address the postmaster and enclose $1.00 he will no doubt reply, giving you the necessary information concerning moving picture shows, or the lack of them, in his city. Unless you enclose the dollar the man probably won't take time to formulate a reply which will be of much value.

Likes the "World." Washington, D. C., writes: "Have been thinking on all the knowledge set forth in the department from one week to another and don't do so long as I can escape up the weekly sum of 10 cents. If any one knows of or ever heard of a Danish print package for interests that can beat the Moving Picture World. I just want them to lead me to it. I do not want my name published, but you may put in the above and the name of the town. I am sending you herewith the sketch of a device I have used with much success on carnuts take-ups.

There is frequently room between the collar "X" and the dowell pin on the take-up shaft, which turns the reel, to allow the metal part of the reel to slip clear over the dowell. Now, in lots of reels the pin gradually grinds out the wood until the dowell pin will slip clear around, the shaft revolving but the reel remaining stationary. The washer is designed to be slipped on over the shaft, and up against the collar "X," thus holding the metal notch of the wheel on the dowell pin and preventing this trouble. The washer is just wide enough to fill the space between the collar and the dowell. If the groove in the washer fits the dowell tight enough so that you have to drive it a little to get it on, it will be all the better, since it will then stay put. It will also hold a crooked reel out far enough to prevent its rubbing on the walls of the magazine. Is there a carbon holder on the market that has an automatic grip which will hold the carbon firmly and give good electrical contact at all times? Those I have used alternately grip the carbon too tight or hold it too loosely, due to the effects of expansion and contraction of the metals. What would a good automatic one be worth to a company like the Powers or Pathe? We have a few shows here in Washington that are a disgrace to the city. One house here has been showing the Pathe Passion Play, 1900 vintage, and on their boards have advertised it as 1910 production. I run a copy of the 1900 Passion Play for ten weeks straight in a house in New Orleans in the year 1907 and I think I know it when I see it."

We thank you for the drawing of the washer scheme. The idea is good. As to the automatic carbon holder, I know of no such device on the market at the present time, but would suggest that you write the Powers and Pathe companies direct, though large companies are a little bit skeptical in such matters and have to be shown very plainly the advantage of any device. As to the Washington shows, I have another letter this week, from a prominent exhibitor of that city, sharply criticising another feature of Washington projection. Unfortunately, it is crowded out, but will appear in next issue. We are, of course, pleased to know that you like the "World" and trust we may continue to merit your regard.

Victim of the Law.—Mr. Arthur Lewis, 393 Eighth Ave., New York City, an Englishman, age 40, is one of the victims of the idiotic law which says that no one but an American citizen can earn his living in New York by operating a moving picture machine, though he can run a pawn shop, open up an office on Wall Street and skin the suckers, lay brick, build houses, run a street car or do about anything else he wants to. I haven't personally viewed Friend Lewis' work, but he looks like a sober, competent man, and he has a good record both in electric and calcium gas projection work. Anyone in Jersey, Connecticut or elsewhere who is will to give Mr. Lewis a position can correspond directly with him.

Splendid Meetings.—Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union Auxiliary No. 35 is having splendid meetings and is initiating from 50 to 125 each meeting. Order is gradually evolving from chaos and the future looks bright.

Has Quit School—Mr. Geo. Pruitt, Portland, Me., writes: "I understand you are no longer with the Taylor School. Is that correct?" Yes, Neighbor Pruitt, I have severed all connection with the school.

Crowded Out.—I have been obliged to lay over several letters until next week. Also I have been compelled to cut my comments very short this week by reason of lack of space. The editor says we simply cannot have the whole paper.

OPERATORS' BALL A SUCCESS.

The New York City Moving Picture Operators' Benevolent Association's ball, given last week, was a pronounced success. The affair was well attended and everything moved smoothly from start to finish. The music was excellent and colored light effects added to the beauty of the scene. The vaudeville entertainment was enjoyable and roundly encored.

A UNIQUE FILM.

The Flea Circus film, State rights of which were advertised in last week's paper by C. H. Dikeman, Lyceum Theater, Washington, D. C., is a most unique as well as a most interesting film. It depicts Prof. R. A. Nokes, the trainer of the fleas, first in a series of explanations of the instruments; microscopes, incubator, etc., used in teaching these tiny insects to do their stunts. The manner of breaking a flea from jumping by confining it in a glass globe as well as the punishment of unruly subjects by suspension from a chain is also thrown on the screen. The collaring of a flea is performed and the feeding of these insects is shown. The circus outfit is displayed and the real show begins. The fleas are seen pulling chariots, turning a merry-go-round filled with riders, juggling and walking a tight-rope with a somersault in the middle of the slack wire (cat-gut). There is a tread mill act by one smart creature and a ball room scene of merry dancers. Other stunts equally as extraordinary and engaging are shown. The photographic work deserves praise. Despite the high magnification necessary to bring the flea to the size of people, the scenes are wonderfully clear. It is the unusualness of the subject of this film that gives it its greatest value, exhibiting as it does an extraordinary performance by fleas. Heretofore such exhibitions, rare as they are, have only been possible under a microscope; but through the motion picture camera the general public may witness a Flea Circus in all its cleverness. The reel is also instructive, throwing an interesting sidelight on these otherwise troublesome creatures, whom we know only for their habit of biting and our consequent scratching. W. H.

"CLARK'S CAPTURE OF KASKASKIA."

At the outbreak of the Revolutionary War, George Rogers Clark was the leader of the patriot army on the frontier and did grand service for the cause of the Colonies. His capture at night of Fort Kaskaskia, Illinois, on July 4, 1778, with 200 Virginia backwoodsmen was a daring escapade. They overpowered the sentries, took the fort and raised the Stars and Stripes in place of the English flag, while the English officers were at a ball not far distant. Clark then went with a few of his party, entered the ball-room alone and announced to the astonished guests that they were now dancing under the American flag. This is the story of the Champion release for May 3rd, another splendid addition to their historic series. Independent exhibitors everywhere, who do not get it, will miss a reel that every audience would like to see.

Demands Specified Booth.—The village board of Girard, Ill., has passed an ordinance forbidding the operation of moving picture machines unless installed in a "standard moving picture machine booth to be approved by the Illinois Inspection Bureau of Chicago."

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and any one can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of three dollars ($3) cash with order, we will send by express, charges not prepaid, the following:

24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address

LICENSED.

"A Knight of the Road" (Biograph).—A story of a typical hobo. He performs a service which secures him the offer of a permanent situation. But like all of his class the call of the road is too strong and he returns to his wanderings, content to be one of the knights who stray as they list, without home or occupation. It is an interesting character study of a well known character, which seems to be always with us.

"Helping Him Out" (Lubin).—We have here another of the sparkling comedies for which Lubin has established a reputation. The story of the elopement is one of the best comedies presented in a long time. That all the family should give the young man money and suggest an elopement is a conceit which cannot fail to win applause from almost any audience. It is really one of the most pleasing conceptions of this type that has been put on the screen in many moons. Actors and photography are alike good, helping materially in the interpretation of the story.

"An Unwilling Cowboy" (Melies).—This is a comedy built around Western characters and scenes. Papa didn't exactly like to have his daughter marry a cowboy. Still less did he like being one himself. But through the persuasions, all more or less vigorous, of the boys, he consents to both and discovers that the exercise on the ranch helps his rheumatism. So allends happily and everybody has fun. The sport is so good that it is contagious and the satisfaction of those who see the film seems almost without limit.

"The Mother" (Selig).—This strongly sentimental picture deals with a mother's love for her son. It takes her on a long journey when she learns that he is in prison. Her efforts seem unavailing until the real criminal confesses. Then comes a thrilling ride which saves him from the gallows. The film was prepared for the avowed purpose of exhibiting the strength of mother-love, and admirably it succeeds. The actors have entered into the spirit of the play. The photography is excellent. The stage manager also has done his part well. No applause followed this film, but it must be said that the music as given did not harmonize with the play. With a film so filled with the purest sentiment as this there should be no sudden crashes nor any loud music at all. With harmony between the two the impression upon the audience will no doubt be very marked.

"How Spriggins Took Lodgers" (Edison).—This farce is taken from "Le On Parle Francais," the well known and liked English farce. Those who have seen it on the stage and can now see it upon the screen will realize that it suffers a good deal in the reproduction in a photoplay, but it is still funny enough to be worth while. The numerous episodes reach their climax in the duel in which the tall major and the small Frenchman undertake to settle differences with one large and one very small pistol. The acting is admirable and the mechanical work is excellent. The audience laughed from the beginning to the end.

"Th ePhoney Prince" (Kalem).—We have here a humorous film detailing the adventures of two lovers when the mother of the girl decided that nothing short of a Persian prince would do for her daughter. Probably everybody was ultimately pleased except the real prince, but maybe his introduction into American ways was useful to him in his own country. The comedy is good and though the idea has been utilized before, it has not been developed in any better style.

"A New Life" (Pathe).—The story of a woman who shoots a burglar and then nurses him back to health and a better life. He repays by driving away his pal who ultimately comes to rob. It is a film of sentiment and has good qualities.

"In the Province of Kwang Tung" (Urban).—This gives us an instructive trip through this Chinese province. It gives an accurate reproduction of the scenery and the manners and customs of the people. The visit to Hankow, the center of the Chinese cotton industry, should be valuable to those in this country interested in either the production or manufacture of cotton. It shows more clearly than words the methods of cultivation and handling, and exhibits very graphically what the West has to fear from China in the cotton market. The photography is admirable and the selection of scenes and objects to illustrate was made with discretion.

"Solving the Servant Problem" (Urban).—This truly delightful magic-comic film makes an appeal that is all its own. Heaven never makes a more competent creature than the truly competent women is. The manageress of the intelligence office in this film is a decided wonder. Housewives will be tickled by her cleaning up of the kitchen of one of her slovenly girls. It would make the Gold Dust Twins green with envy. That kind of work isn't the only way in which she shows her intelligence either. She knows how to make love. The actress's characterization also is excellent. The study of her face is one of the funniest things on the screen.

"Turned to the Wall" (Edison).—A picture based upon Charles Reade's story, "Put Yourself in his Place." It deals with the loves of two people, the sister of a squire who turns her out because she dares love a tradesman and her son, an expert wood carver, later. The theme is a picture of his sister which the squire turns to the wall when she leaves the house, which is turned back at the request of the son years afterward. There are several more or less exciting scenes, notably the fight at the old church in the wood and the very theatrical snow storm in which the girl and her father nearly perish. The denouement is happy, re-uniting persons who have been separated for years. The actors have performed their parts with sympathy and discretion and the photography is all that could be desired.

"The Insurrecto" (Kalem).—This story ostensibly represents some of the scenes in the present uprising in Mexico. But the picture presents nothing that would stamp it as connected with the Mexican difficulty except the presence of the ammunition train. Indeed, it might be made at any time and might be also merely a picture of any brush warfare by a portion representing the insurrecto wounded and dying, as well as that which shows the sheriff's posse and the capture of the wounded man by the miner, present none of the pomp of war; yet, perhaps the picture will be more beneficial than interesting for this reason. If this represents the Mexican imbroglio accurately there is little inducement for soldiers of fortune to follow the insurrectos further into the Mexican domain.

"Boil Your Water" (Pathe).—We have here an interesting and helpful film. Here is a drop of water illustrated upon the screen. All sorts of living creatures are seen, each sufficiently large for its characteristics to be studied. For instance, the typhoid bacilli is magnified 4000 times and is big enough to be plainly distinguished. After showing the terrors which lurk in such a drop the scientist boils the water until it appears upon the screen clear and free from such horrible organisms.

"Mary Long and Tommy Short" (Pathe).—This comedy cannot fail to provoke roars of laughter from any audience. There is a good deal of lively fun included and everybody seems to enjoy it.

"The Troublesome Secretaries" (Vitagraph).—This film pictures the difficulties of an old man who has a pretty daughter, with whom two secretaries become desperately enamored. After trying numerous expedients with one of them he discovers that the young people are too sharp for him and he gives his consent to a wedding which is supposed to end all his troubles.

"His Mother's Scare" (Biograph).—This story is told amid beautiful scenery, but has some unhealthy qualities. Happily, however, just before the flood of violence inspired by jealousy, is counteracted the old pre-cut theme of the mother, whose feelings and the murderer stays his hand. There is a touch of heart interest which grips one so strongly that the emotions are awakened. Acted with all the ability of the Biograph players, this homely, yet moving, photoplay will please a large proportion of audiences.

"The Hoyden" (Lubin).—This film tells the story of a tomboy of a girl who develops into a woman in three short years and relates the misadventures of the young lieutenant when he fell in love with her on second meeting and did not recognize her as the one to whom he was engaged. Of course the wedding bells rang just the same. The comedy is lively and the theme is different from any that has been worked out in a love story so far.

"Lai Chyeim" (Pathe).—A rather pathetic picture detailing the story of the love and disappointment of Abraham and Rachel. But it must be said that the theme is not pleasant, for it teaches that a woman may leave her husband and go with another man and be happy. It shows the evil result of this upon the man forsaken, not the one who was responsible for the outrage. The punishment is shifted and therefore the moral effect of the picture, if that is what is intended, is lost. The author may justify the result by replying that the girl was forced to marry the man she did not want in the beginning and that her subsequent actions were largely the result of that compulsion. Whichever way the picture is viewed, however, the influence is bad and the effect is unpleasant. The film has, however, rare qualities, artistic beauty of grouping, save in the crowd about the wedding ceremony, an interesting ritual, the betrothal feast, restrained acting and graceful actors. This last is common enough.

"Unto us a Child is Born" (Selig).—Here we have a story of unreasonably jealousy, with a supposed murder and much other difficulty in its wake. The interesting feature is the method taken to inform the wanderer of the fact that a joyous event has occurred at home. To send him the opening bars of an old Christmas hymn is sufficiently novel to carry the picture, regardless of the fact that the story itself is somewhat hackneyed.

"The Indian Maiden's Lesson" (Essanay).—By presenting the commandment "Thou shalt not kill" to a man with a diseased mind he is prevented from murdering one who stole his property and injured him so badly that he never recovered his memory. It is the work of an Indian maiden and has some elements of human interest in it, but the same idea has been utilized before, consequently it is not wholly original.

"The Erring Son" (Gaumont).—This is a tale of a son who commits a crime and is abandoned by all his people excepting his sister. She alone writes to him in prison and helps him after his release. Eventually the family is brought together by the sister's husband when he discovers the true state of affairs, for the family had kept him in ignorance and he, at first, suspected this his young wife was untrue to him. It is a homely domestic story, of considerable heart interest. The acting is restrained and the story rational.

"The Chief's Talisman" (Pathe).—This is an interesting tale told to a little girl who asked her grandmother for a story. A picture of an Indian chief is hanging on the wall and the story is of this picture. The grandmother and the girl are kept on the film while the story is told. This is a much more realistic way of telling such a tale, than to tell it with the story teller hidden. It shows a story of a great chief who revered the cross and of his successor who went back to the old beliefs. The Christian chief gave the talisman to the girl's grandfather, a missionary. The new chief attacks the grandfather's cabin and takes it. In the cabin the talisman hangs and the new chief dare not harm the family, for it seems alive to him.

"The Spirit of the Light" (Vitagraph).—An interesting heart story is here shown, but it is oppressed with sorrowful occurrences. A girl drifts away in an open boat, leaving a feeble old light keeper unable to care for the light house. He drops dead. The girl's lover, warned in a vision, which seems to be the girl herself, returns and cares for the light alone through long years. The story is well told and the scenic qualities are beyond the average, but a feeling of depression follows the film which is not pleasant. Perhaps it might be said, however, that this feeling is a tribute to its dramatic strength.

INDEPENDENT.

"The Stolen Legacy" (Great Northern).—In this Sherlock Holmes story, which has much merit and interest, a will is stolen and through a series of amusing incidents Sherlock Holmes captures the thieves and secures the legacy for the countess. Some of the methods utilized by thieves like these in obtaining access to safes and the means they take to rid themselves of troublesome relatives are clearly shown. The photography is good and the acting is quite in keeping with the subject.

"A Marriage Celebrated Among the Savages" (Itala).—A wedding ceremony among savages is here shown. We see their curious customs in making man and wife one. The photography is remarkably good for a subject of this character, which, as may be suspected, is none of the easiest.

"Foolshead, Wrangle for Love" (Itala).—Once again this favorite comedian appears, this time giving some interesting pointers to those similarly afflicted. He is Foolshead just the same, but because he is he raises a laugh and the audience seems delighted to see him again.

"The Last Rose" (Powers).—This lively story details the adventures of an American in Ireland in attempting to secure the last rose from an interesting little flower girl, notwithstanding the objections of four British soldiers. The American audience will be delighted to see the young Yankee captain come from the field in triumph, bearing with him not only the rose, but the flower girl as well. It is a good, sparkling story and is told with much gusto by the Powers players.

"In the Tepee's Light" (Reliance).—The popularity of this film will not depend so much upon the love story as upon that gorgeous sunrise with which it closes, a scene at once wild and glorious. Of the wedding of Indian maidens there has been no end, even by force, but of such sunrises the photoplay has shown too few. The Indian characteristics have been studied, with some care, but it must be admitted that like most pictures of this type the Indians are poetic rather than natural. The wild scenes at the road house and about the tepee are, perhaps, sufficiently suggestive of actual occurrences to satisfy the craving for that species of excitement, but after all such scenes do not leave a favorable impression. The memory of that glorious morning will linger long and will operate to obscure some of the unpleasant features.

"Gen. Meade's Fighting Days" (Champion).—This is a war story, with plenty of the thrilling scenes which make war glorious in the minds of very many people. The conditions which are here presented might have existed anywhere during those stirring times in the Civil War; the story is not improbable. The ebb and flow of battle, with its ghastly consequences, is far too real to be pleasant. The love tale interwoven, helped by the intervention of General Meade's men, is interesting. Conditions in war are so involved and there is so much difficulty in understanding what really happens that any mixture in the situations in this film may be overlooked. The action is excellent and the audience looked on with unabated attention from beginning to end.

"Herodias" (Eclair).—This is the well known Biblical story, based upon the execution of John the Baptist. The execution is prompted by Herod's wife for revenge. Some commentators have made the motive love, but the revenge idea seems most likely to be correct. The film is well acted and is realistic enough to satisfy the most ardent advocate of realism in the pictures. The settings are Oriental and are, in some degree, suggestive. The story is well told, but the situations are relieved only by the magnificence of the pictures. Salome's dancing is one of the features of the play.

"While There's Life, There's Hope" (Imp).—Here is a story of two men who decided to commit suicide, but were interrupted in their mad desires by a series of incidents which might occur anywhere. They both go to the same hotel and take adjoining rooms. The noise of one falling, overcome by coal gas, prevents the other from carrying out his intentions of shooting himself. Then they decide to begin the battle over again, each encouraged by the sympathy of another in distress. The story is interesting because it suggests possibilities that are easily accepted as probable. It is the mutual helpfulness of two unfortunates as shown in this film that makes it worthy. In this quality the film is out of the ordinary and should interest any audience by its series of strange occurrences.

"Bud Nevins, Bad Man" (American).—This is a good Western picture, showing how "Bud Nevins, Bad Man," met his Waterloo in a ranchman's pretty daughter. The story of the way she cured him is as interesting as anything the firm has put out in a long time. The favorite idea of contest, with the weaker winning, makes this picture as interesting as such films usually are. It is not a question of possibility at all. It is whether some one wins or loses, and when the winner is apparently the weaker then there is even more delight in the situation. The setting is Western, with cowboys and horses and such accessories to help out.

"Why the Sheriff Resigned" (Yankee).—Here is a picture made among the mountains, with a murder to avenge an insult, a sheriff with a broken arm nursed back to health by the murderer's wife and the later discovery by the sheriff of the entire situation. When he finds out what has happened he doesn't condone the offense and keep his office, but gives the office up. It is one way of vindicating the law, but doesn't leave as good an impression as it would if he had followed his plain duty and had arrested the man who committed the crime. Perhaps he was justified, but there is the bad influence in allowing the law to be flouted. The setting is excellent and the audience looks on with interest.

"A Half-Breed's Courage" (Champion).—This Western story is full of the action and go of the plains. It displays in striking fashion the gratitude of a half-breed who yields to the entreaty of a woman who befriended him and goes to be hanged in place of her husband. Possibly this is a trait of half-breeds which hitherto has not been sufficiently understood or appreciated. There is plenty of wild riding, cowboys and horses, with plenty of Western local color in these scenes.

"The Rival Artists" (Nestor).—Here we have a story showing how a party of critics were led into giving praise to a fine artist by thinking they were looking at the picture of another man, who was popular. The love story interwoven is an addition and the denouement, when the judge congratulates his future son-in-law, who was the real artist, is a good ending. The photography, like that in all the Nestor films, is striking and adds materially to the attractiveness of the picture. In some indefinable way the producer has developed a distinctly individual method of photography which is as good as it is unusual.

"The Old Excuse" (Solax).—This is a lively comedy which will keep the audience laughing throughout. It details with some degree of originality the old excuse which men often give after they show what they are.

"A Scheme That Failed" (Solax).—A comedy which has sufficient merit to keep the audience busy laughing during the time it is running. It is short, snappy, well acted and the photography is good.

"Resignation" (Imp).—This film shows first a picture of a man in a prison cell. He rails at his fate; but then seems to see, as in a dream, the events leading up to his imprisonment for unintentional manslaughter in a struggle to get from a blackmailing scoundrel a package of his wife's letters. He does not know what is in these letters; in fact, as soon as he gets them he burns them. He won't explain and so is sent to prison. It ends in his being resigned to his position. The picture is unusual. We commend it.

"The Hero" (Imp).—This comedy shows what follows when Artie discovers that he must prove himself worthy, or the young woman will not have him. His first attempt with the prize-fighter, whom he has bribed to be insulting and then take a licking, fails, for the prize-fighter gets mad and after drubbing Artie gives back his money. He then tries to be both burglar and hero. He makes a successful capture of himself and when he returns the stolen jewels, Maude tumbles into his arms assured that he is the real man and not a base imitation. Her father is also taken in. The chase and lightning changes are alike lively and funny.

"One Month to Live" (American).—This film is a comedy. A sporty husband makes a serious mistake and through the development of the story learns some things which are of considerable value to him. The audience laughed more than once while the film was running. The mechanical work has been well done and the entire picture is a desirable addition to any program.

"A Daughter of the Revolution" (Rex).—This is an interesting historical photoplay, giving excellent reproductions of scenes in both the British and Continental armies. A mixed-up love affair furnishes the heart interest and is interestingly complicated by making the girl, a daughter of a Tory judge, in love with a Continental. The situations are well worked out and when the attack is made, the Americans drive the British before them and the lover finds Dorothy in the British lines, there arises a situation fraught with much danger. Yet it is successfully smoothed out. When the wedding occurs Washington himself gives away the bride. The appearance of Washington is a happy romantic addition, yet it may be doubted if even his genial temper would have consented to so many attendances upon weddings as have recently been shown in various ways. The actors of this drama play their parts with spirit and the scenes of conflict are realistic and well staged. The tendency to crowding is not so apparent here as it is in some instances, and yet there is an impression of number sufficiently to make the scenes look real. The photography has been managed with skill and the mechanical work has been satisfactorily carried out. It is an interesting film and has its uses as an educational picture as well as an entertaining story.

"The Voice of His Conscience" (Solax).—In this love story, a testy father falls on a knife during a scuffle with a tenant and is accidentally killed, and the lover is accused of the deed. After a series of somewhat exciting incidents the young man is exonerated and the facts in the case are developed. The actors have done well in their various parts and the story is sufficiently thrilling in its complications to hold the audience from beginning to end.

"Weighed in the Balance" (Thanhouser).—Girls have heretofore offered themselves as sacrifices in distasteful marriages to save their fathers from being turned out of their homes when mortgages fall due, but the exciting incidents connected with this story are seldom present. The feature of this film is a bomb explosion. The audience sees its fuse sputtering and feels as though but a little more would scare it half to death. The preferred lover, cad-like, tells the girl on her way to the altar to marry the banker, that he is going to commit suicide. She decides to die with him. She finds him with the bomb; he hasn't lighted it. She lights it and its fuse sputters. The cad is scared and runs away. The rich banker finds the girl gone and hurries to find her. He dares throw the bomb out of the window. Thus the two men are weighed. The poor one proves a cad; the rich one a hero. It ends with the wedding march. It is well acted and the photography is clear despite the difficulty of some portions of the subject.

"A Cowboy for a Day" (Bison).—This is a lively and interesting Western story, at which one is forced to laugh in spite of one's self. It depicts life upon the plains with a good deal of fidelity to the real characters usually seen there. The photography is excellent and the story told is clear and easily comprehended. Its best quality is its good humor. A good deal of common sense went into producing this farce.

"Dr. Grant's Wonderful Discovery" (Lux).—This absorbing story is based on incidents in the medical profession. It is clearly told and is convincing. The actors have impressed it well. The mechanical department has performed its portion of the work well. Altogether it makes a film which seems to please an audience.

"The Minister's Son" (Yankee).—This film tells of a girl, adopted by a minister. She afterward is accused of a theft which was committed by the minister's own son and the girl is turned out of doors for it. Fortunately the young man returns in time to find her and set all matters straight.

"The Poet of the People" (Thanhouser).—This story—probably taken from some old book of tales—presents sharp contrasts. A poet of the people in rags reads a poem to a king in which his majesty is severely criticised. Small wonder that he is hurried away to summary execution. But here enters a girl, a ward of the king, whose heart has been touched and whose love flows freely toward this poet as following a poet's duty in attempting to lighten the wrongs which oppress the people. Her plea for him is successful and though the noose has been placed about the unfortunate poet's neck the king and his ward arrive in time to pardon him. Then the gathering get something better than an execution, they get a wedding. The crafty old king here—he looks very much like Louis IX. of France—is an excellent piece of acting. If all the parts had been as well acted, the picture would have been an "all star" affair.

STORIES of the FILMS

VITAGRAPH.

THE DERELICT REPORTER—Bob Flanegan, a reporter of decayed but somewhat uncertain character, has had hard sledding since the Managing Editor's forbearance when he strews up at the newspaper office late and sleepy from his night's spree.

It is announced that the Governor of the State will visit the prison quarries that day to personally investigate strike conditions. Bob asks for the assignment and is given one more chance to make good.

As mercenaried workmen are employed, an explosion ensues, in which the Governor is hurt. Bob happened to be near at hand, and after pleading him in the aide of his secretary, hastens to the railroad depot to give his newspaper a telegraphic report. While doing so a couple of committee reporters drag him from the office. Bob sends some telegraph linemen regaining wires. He tells them his story; they tap the wires for him, and Bob is thus enabled to get his report to his newspaper.

Returning to the city, he is received by the Managing Editor of his paper with open arms, heartily congratulated and rewarded with a better job and increased salary.

HUNGRY HEARTS—Dick and Elsie, hunger for the love of their parents, who leave them night after night without imparting even as much as a kiss of motherly and fatherly affection. Observing their lonely condition, they observe in the opposite house the attention bestowed upon a child by its parents. Immediately they plan to feign sickness. After being put to bed that evening, they are seized with what appears to be severe pains. The family physician sends a message to their parents telling them that their presence is needed instantly by the children.

This alarms the parents, and they at once return home and he advises them to send for a specialist, who comes without delay and discovers that the children are suffering with heart hunger for the love of their parents. At the advice of the Dr. and Mrs. Warren that they alone can cure the ailment of their children, by bestowing their love upon them. Ashamed of themselves, Mr. and Mrs. Warren then and there begin to follow the advice of the old doctor, and readily the young children respond to their tender and loving treatment.

SOLDIERS THREE.—Three laddies ask and obtain a leave of absence for a day to visit their aged mother. On their journey to the station they call on three Highland lassies. It is a warm day, the laddies resume their journey but find it unusually oppressive and decide to take a swim in cool and refresh themselves. While enjoying their baths and frolicsome sport, the lassies, out strolling along the bank of the river are seen by the three laddies, who hide from their notice. The lassies suddenly come upon the scene of their beaus, call their names aloud, and receiving no reply, decide that the boys have left without them. Gathering up the discarded clothing of the boys, they make haste to report the accident.

The laddies hasten to the shore to dress themselves and discover that their clothes have been stolen. Finally each one gathers up a bunch of brush.

They reach their mother's home, who is almost frightened to death. Hiding the brush as they enter the house, she has to furnish them with some of her own dresses and hats in order to make the boys presentable.

The three girls have by this time reached the barracks and reported to the officers of the laddies' regiment, that the three young men have all been drowned, showing their clothes as evidence of their statement. The three Highlanders put in an appearance under guard, being forced to report for duty, regardless of their funny "make ups." They are court martialed for having their uniforms.

In the guard house the boys blame each other for their predicament and one after the other starts to cry, gloom and despair written upon their countenances, which soon change to broad smiles when the guard hands each one of them a "Flora de Perfecto," which they light and complacently smoke with relish.

EDISON.

THE TWO HEROES—At a skirmish in the second battle of Bull Run two soldiers, Ned Helser and Bill Hall, race to recapture a flag which had been taken by the enemy. They reach it at the same time and quarrel over the honor of reaching it first. The incident makes them bitter enemies, their hatred of each other lasting in spite of diminished years later when a juggle of fate finds them political rivals.

The only son of William Hall falls in love with Ethel Helser, daughter of Hamilton Helser, formerly Ned Helser. Ethel reciprocates young Hall's affection and to overcome the difficulties strewn in their path by their parents, they decide to elope. The old veterans unluckily follow, but are compelled to abandon the chase at the depot, where they arrive just as the train pulls out with the young couple aboard. Again the old rivals snap their fingers in each other's faces and argue as to who reached there first, taking leave of each other in a rage.

Later we find Helser in an inn, where he is grossly insulted by a ruffian who is about to throttle him. Hall, who happens to pass the inn at the critical moment, runs to Helser's rescue, after which the two veterans forget their little differences and become fast friends. They forthwith go to the telegraph office, where they send the following telegram:

"Don't spend money like a blame fool. All is forgiven. You and Ethel come back quick.

"NED HALL,
"POP HELSER."

Upon arriving home the happy couple receive the joint blessings of their reconciled parents, and peace and happiness reign once more.

THE CHILD AND THE TRAMP.—"Reckless" is a tramp through and through. He refuses to become a burglar and leaves his two tramp companions to go begging while he goes into his own.

Two years later "Reckless" sees his two tramp friends and learns that they are the Golden Valley Mining Company.

Consequently when, on begging at a back door for something to eat in a small town in lower California, "Reckless" sees a child in distress he rescues it and thereby learns that the father of the little family has invested his savings in mining stock in the Golden Valley Mining Company, he is somewhat interested.

And so, without saying anything, "Reckless" decides to take the situation into his own hands and performs a journey across the country, until he reaches Golden Valley. Then he gains entrance to the office and finds that his former companions are just about to close their doors, after having already accumulated. He holds up the one whom he finds in the office and after extracting a signed confession, takes from him the books and papers, the treasurer of the family in California.

He then resumes his journey until he arrives at the little home. Even now his tramp nature asserts itself, for he does not boldly come to the front door and proclaim his identity, but sneaks through the window, to find that the news of the collapse of the Gold Mining Company has preceded him and that the little wife-child has already been overwhelmed by it. Surprised by the child, he presents her with the ten thousand dollars in bills which he has taken from his ill-gotten gains, and goes out through the window, and the story closes with the joy of the family over the return of their money.

THE PANAMA CANAL IN 1911.—As the dim stars fade from the canal from the Pacific side looking up the entrance. We next take up the operations of the chief engineer, Mr. Gaillard from the dirt trains and spreading it along the line, etc., and we find that the Panama canal is becoming a piece of engineering work which the world will never forget.

AIDA.—Aida, daughter of the King of Ethiopia, having fallen a prisoner into the hands of the Egyptians, is given as a slave by their king to his daughter Amneris, who is jealous of the surpassing beauty of the unknown maid, takes her into favor. Radames, a young captain of the king's guards, arrives in Amneris' apartments, falls in love with her and his passion is reciprocated by Aida. The proud Amneris, suspecting a rival in her slave, swears to get her revenge.

Meanwhile war is again declared between Egypt and Ethiopia and Radames, appointed leader of the army by the High Priest of Isis, is invested with the sacred arms and departs to fight the Ethiopians who, headed by their brave king, invade Egypt. Radames defeats them and returns victorious, followed by the prisoners, among whom is the king himself disguised as an officer.

Through the intercession of Radames the prisoners are set free, with the exception of the king who, being recognized as Aida's father, is detained with her. As a reward for his great services Radames is given the hand of Amneris in marriage.

The Ethiopian king in his captivity, having noticed the mutual affection existing between Radames and Aida and realizing that he is in a secret meeting place near the Temple of Isis, forces Aida to obtain from Radames the secret by which the Egyptians are to attack the Ethiopians.

Radames incautiously reveals the plans to Aida but is overheard by Amneris and the High Priest, who are in the temple and who suddenly appear and accuse Radames of treason. He is brought to judgment and condemned to be buried alive, but is visited by Amneris, who offers him pardon from the king if he renounces Aida forever. He refuses and goes bravely to death.

He enters the tomb and as the stone is being slowly lowered, he discovers Aida by his side. She had entered the tomb and has come to prove the depth of her love by sharing his fate.

JOSH AND CINDY'S WEDDING TRIP.—Josh Witherspoon and Cindy Snodgrass leave upon a dilapidated automobile and its anxious owner, Judge Wright, in search of Cupid. Josh is pessimistic in predicament and anxiety to return home, Josh drives him to the railroad station in his buckboard. The judge offers to demonstrate Josh and Cindy for their trouble, but they decline. The judge then gives them his card and extends an invitation to call on him, should they ever visit the big city.

In due time Josh and Cindy are married and take a "wedding trip" to New York City via the sights and also endeavor to find Judge Wright. While wandering through the streets they stumble upon a big wallet full of money lying on the side walk. They proceed on independent shopping tours to buy each other beautiful presents, only to meet again a short while after in the police station, both charged with passing counterfeit money. The next morning they are hauled into court like two criminals before Judge Wright, who recognizes them and assists them in establishing their innocence, paying for the goods they have bought from his own pocket and sending them home happy ones.

SELIG.

HER MASTER.—In a remote settlement of New England in colonial days lived the local master, High Rieve, was the cause of much flattering excitement on the part of the fair sex, and there was an eager attendance on the part of all his scholars, excepting only the coquettish daughter of old John Mayden.

Mistress Jacquetin dawdled, was late and took the reprimand of the grave young man with such bad temper that he was forced to discipline her on the very first day of school. War between them was thus declared, and she rendered poor Rieve's life a burden by her mischievous and fascinating high spirit. He was attracted to her in spite of her selfishness, and she to him, although she rebelled against his authority.

One day she went so far that he was compelled to punish her before the school, and broken hearted she ran along the snowy paths, not noticing where she went, until she was saddled by a storm and brought her to a realization that she was lost, and unable to walk.

Rieve found her and he had gone too far in upbraiding her high spirit, and after school he went to her home to apologize and explain. She had not returned, and was also at the home of Judah, her chum. With fear and foreboding he saddled his horse and started out for her, to arrive just in time to protect her from a renegade Indian, to fight for her and receive a wound in doing so.

Silently watching he, fearing she was mortally offended, she realizing at last his magnanimity and her love. In her home once more, he started to ride off, but on proceeding her overtures for a reconciliation, so that poor Jacquetin was compelled to pocket her pride and propose to him.

IN OLD CALIFORNIA, WHEN THE GRINGOS CAME.—In the days of the reconstruction period of California after the government of the United States had formally taken over the vast territory ceded by the Mexican republic, the commissioning agents met with much trouble from the contemptuous refusal of the old Spanish Dons to register their claims. Many old land grants, the many of them issued by the King of Spain,—with the new government.

By this refusal they rendered themselves liable to having their lands pre-empted and claimed by men who immediately became squatters. In many cases this was done, although the government did all it could to prevent such injustice.

This state of affairs had been based upon such an attempt by an unscrupulous American adventurer, who, hearing from a messenger of the local land agent at Santa Barbara, that he had been treated badly by one of the old Spanish families, in his efforts to secure their titles to possession, claim of their enormous estate, legally but nefariously, and in spite of the entreaties of the land agent, whose hands are tied by the stubbornness of the Spaniards.

His attempt is almost successful, and he is only foiled at the last moment by the efforts of the quick-witted padre of Santa Barbara Mission, who, learning that he has shot an Indian boy in cold blood, charges him with being a criminal and outlaw. The adventurer, backed by a gang of frontier ruffians, refuses to use force and disregard the law, but is shot by the land agent as he threatens the life of the young Spaniard, and all ends well.

LOST AND WON.—Jack Carrel, a young ambitious clerk, is in the employ of the wealthy and aristocratic Mr. Fielding. Jack has cast his eye for all that is good and beautiful, dares to raise his eyes to Ethel, Mr. Fielding's daughter, and is caught in the act of declaring his love to her, with the result that he is immediately dismissed from the employ of Mr. Fielding. He is soon successful in securing a position as traveling companion for an invalid, with whom he goes on a ranch in the West.

A year later we find that Mr. Fielding has met with reverses in business—he and his daughter are compelled to leave their luxurious home for simpler quarters. Mabel discovers an ad wherein a moving picture manufacturer seeks the services of a young lady to pose for pictures and having talents for the stage, she applies for the position and is accepted.

In the meantime Jack has also had a change of fortune, but for the better. Having taken a great liking to Jack, the invalid leaves a fortune to him on his death. Jack finds occasion to invest his money in an oil field and soon is a gusher. We see the laborers at work on the drilling of the well —the discovery of oil and the wonderful oil gusher in full action—terminating in a sea of oil. The resources of the well is beyond all expectations and Jack is made a man of great wealth.

Next we see the interior of a moving picture theater and Jack in the audience. To his great surprise and delight a picture is shown wherein Mabel takes part. He learns the name of the firm which made the picture and hastens to the moving picture studio where he is successful in meeting Mabel and learns that she still loves him. The moving picture director was obliged to look for another leading lady.

The big Lawe View Oil Gusher at Maricopa, California, the location of this picture, was struck March 12th, 1910. It tore away derricks and shot 350 feet in the air. The original well was 12 inches in diameter and at the time the picture was made the crater measured 40 feet in width and 2,250 feet deep. It flows from 50,000 to 75,000 barrels per day. All buildings near it had to be abandoned on account of oil spray from the gusher which at times covered a radius of 3 miles, giving everything a thick coating of oil.

THE FIDDLE'S REQUIEM.—The old musician playing his fiddle in his garret home dreams of the youth and his lost love. As the past unfolds itself he sees his sweetheart, Dolores, forced by her parents to sign a contract of marriage with Don Carlos, and he again reads over in memory her message of farewell:

"My only Love—This is my marriage eve—the death day of my soul. I cannot go without one last farewell to you, whom I will never see again. Wait for me by the lake until you hear the bells chime.

Yours in spirit until death,

DOLORES."

Meeting her at the lake as requested, she gives him her old violin, saying: "I have breathed my soul into this violin. Whenever it plays, it is my soul that speaks."

A few days later the tragedy takes place that causes her bereaved parents to withdraw from society and the musician to live in a dream until his work is finished.

WHEN THE DEAD RETURN.—Jacques and Antoine are both in love with the same girl, but Jacques proves the winner and marries Marcele. Nine years after the wedding an accident deprives Jacques of his memory. Not knowing where he is he wanders far from home and takes up a new life, all memory of the old having forsaken him. Years later, Marcele, convinced that Jacques is dead, marries Antione. After ten years of happiness with Antoine Marcele dies, leaving little daughter. About this time, through an accident Jacques' memory is restored and he arrives back at his old home just as his daughter is about to marry. Not realizing the lapse of years he attempts to stop the wedding, believing that his daughter is his wife Marcele. Explanations take place and Jacques is taken to the grave of his sweetheart and wife Marcele.

BIOGRAPH.

THE TWO SIDES.—A Mexican laborer is discharged from the ranch with others, simply to reduce expenses to enhance the proprietor's already large profits. Deprived of his revenue, the poor peasant is in desperation as to the recovery of his sick child. This, however, does not concern the ranch owner, whose own child is possessed of the luxuries money can buy, so he turns a deaf ear to the poor fellow's pleading. Through childish caprice the ranch owner's daughter contrives to run away from home, she resenting mild chastisement from her father, and hides in the barn. Thereby the careless dropping of a cigarette by another workman outside the barn fire occurs, enveloping the barn and placing the child in extreme peril. The Mexican knows this fire and not aware of the child's presence traveling, is trudging through the realm, when the barn catches flame. He finds the child's purse outside the barn door and suspects that the child is inside. At the risk of his own life he dashes in, and as he does not reappears with the child to place her safely in her father's arms.

MISPLACED JEALOUSY.—In the beauty parlor of an excitable French hair-dresser who is madly in love with the pretty manicure girl. He is wild in jealous rage at the attentions shown her by one of the male patrons. He writes to the man's wife but luckily gets wise and turns the tables on the hair-dresser.

CUPID'S JOKE.—A young heiress, tired of the dull routines of her circle, changes places with her maid. A young millionaire, in quest of sport, changes positions with his valet. Both visit the same fashionable winter resort and fall over head and ears in love, each thinking the other a mere creature of his own station. You can't fool Cupid.

GAUMONT.

THE CRUSADE OF THE TEMPLARS.—A titled youth sees a son joins the crusaders and prepares to go to them to Damascus. The morning of the day of his departure he sings her favorite songs to her, accompanying himself with the pipe organ. After a desperate battle his squire leaves him on the field as dead and takes his sword to return it to the Queen. He arrives at the Queen's castle dusty and travel-stained, but cannot summon up courage to tell her of her great loss.

Corrieres then arrange a plan whereby another youth takes the son's place and the Queen receives the substitute with thanksgiving, remaining unaware of the deception.

A few months later, during a great reception, the real son returns. He has entirely recovered from the wounds which his squire had thought were fatal. The Queen mother does not at first believe that he is her son, for she has grown fond of the youth who has been taking his place. In a very impressive scene the real prince proves his identity by singing the songs with which he had solaced her on the day of their separation.

THE YOUNG KING OF ROME.—Napoleon and his son, who is known to history as "The King of Rome," are discovered playing together at Rambouillet's headquarters. Countess de Courvitie is announced. She has a petition praying for the pardon of her son who is to be executed for taking part in a conspiracy. Her prayer is refused, owing out she passes the little king playing with the Grenadiers. Striking into a chant she bursts into tears, attracting the child king. He inquires the reason, then intercedes with Napoleon and is rebuked. Grief-stricken, he is forgiven for his indiscretion by Napoleon, who in turn asks for forgiveness. The little king refuses to forgive his father unless the Empire reads the letter brought by the countess. The Man of Destiny accepts the conditions, reads the letter, sends for the countess and gives her a pardon for her son.

TUNIS AFRICA (The City of White.—Tunis, the capital of Tunis, is built on the shore of a small lagoon, which separates it from the Gulf of Carthage. The first scenes in the views are in Regence and the Cathedral. 2. The Gate of France, which connects the European town with the Great Mosque. 3. The Great Mosque.

We also see some scenes of Arabians in the streets, the souk of Arabians where the copper markets, snake charmers, and the lions' cubs goes to administer justice and the film ends with a general view of the town and the harbor.

PATHE.

FORGIVENESS IS SWEET.—Two girls occupy rooms on the same floor of a lodging house, one is a dressmaker and frugal, the other a street singer, and a spendthrift. They are entertaining, but the dressmaker is constantly warning the street singer against her extravagance. It is summer, and all during the summer days the dressmaker is hoarding up her earnings against winter, while the street singer is spending hers for pretty clothes and in giving lollipops away. When winter comes, the street singer can no longer go forth to sing and she begs her friend the dressmaker to loan her some money, but the dressmaker refuses. It is the old story of the grasshopper and the ant—but wait, the end differs again. The street singer, in despair goes out on her old task again—is seen by a theatrical manager and given a position in the theater. She soon rises to be a star and one day, going home in her automobile, she passes her old friend, the ant. The ant has just found out that the bank where she kept her money has failed and she is penniless. Returning good for evil, the grasshopper, who takes the ant home and keeps her until she gets on her feet again, finds that forgiveness is sweet.

INDIAN JUSTICE.—Leaping Elk is a Pawnee Indian, and he comes to the camp of the Apaches, where he sees Swift Arrow, a beautiful Indian maid. Immediately he is smitten by the god of love and presents to Swift Arrow a little gift, which so pleases the dusky maid that she too falls in love. That night they elope, but are followed by an Apache lover of Swift Arrow, called "Whispering Leaves." Tracking them across the plains, he finally catches them, and there ensues an awful conflict. Many times the victory seems to rest in the hands of first one and then another. Finally, Leaping Elk gets in a fatal blow and throws Whispering Leaves over the cliff into the river below. Here he is later discovered by the members of his tribe, and they swear to be avenged; track Leaping Elk and his little bride and finally catch him and condemn him to death. In a thrilling scene Swift Arrow helps him to escape, and together they make their way to his home country, where, dipping their hands in the waters of the sacred stream, they swear to be faithful to each other until death.

MAX IS FORCED TO WORK.—Out of patience with their son, Max's parents throw him out of the house, and for two days he wanders around the streets in evening costume, disconsolate and hungry, and finally he finds a card of invitation to a soiree at the home of the Count and Countess Zicearini. Thinking that there will be something to eat, he goes and the Count's daughter falls madly in love with him. Forced by his appearances, Max must find employment, and having only a full dress suit to wear he gets a position as a waiter in a cafe. Everything goes well, working days and making love evenings, until finally the Count and his daughter stop in this selfsame cafe and Max about to wait on them. Of course things begin to happen rapidly after that, but it all turns out well in the end and Max is generously forgiven by the people he has duped.

SHORT-LIVED HAPPINESS.—Jack was a boy who never really had a chance and we find him in the opening of this story an inmate of a reform school; he is not very strong and is in consequence treated very harshly by the attendants, because he cannot do his work well. One night he makes his escape and, running on and on through the woods, he finally arrives, about daylight, at a lumber camp. The boss lumberman, a big-hearted man, takes him in, gives him a change of clothing and also a job. The lumberman's daughter soon falls in love with Jack, much to the chagrin of one of the lumbermen, who is himself in love with her, and he plans revenge. Jack is later terribly burned in rescuing Violet from her burning home, and while he is in the hospital, his rival, gathering up his discarded reformatory clothes, carries them to the authorities and tells them where poor Jack is. An officer is sent for him and he arrives just as Violet is about to give Jack some roses. When Jack sees the officer the shock is too great for him, and, hovering between life and death as he is, he turns his face to the wall and dies. Violet is heart-broken and places a few white roses beside her poor Jack, whose only happiness in life has thus been cut short after just a few days.

THE BELATED BRIDEGROOM.—Carl Bridgeton was detained on important business just on the eve of his wedding. He would have been on time, however, if he had not jumped off his train at the station to get a newspaper and failed to board it again before it left. He hired an automobile to rush on to his bride. The car had not gone more than a mile when it got stuck in the mud; so he started out to walk. Then he got a chance to buy a motorcycle, and after brief instructions he continued on his way, but his inexperience with the motorcycle led to a wreck. Emerging from this, badly battered, but still living, he hailed a passing farmer, who agreed to take him in his buggy. The wheel of the buggy came off and again landed him in the ditch. Then he succeeded in buying a bicycle from a farmer boy, which succeeded in breaking down before long. By this time he looked more like a tramp than anything else. He was chased by farmers and dogs. Then he exchanged clothes with a scarecrow and finally arrived in town, only to be arrested as a crazy man. He secured his release after a couple of hours and rushed to the appointed place of the wedding, where he found that the bride, thinking he was not coming, had married the best man. Carl was in despair until he was consoled by the bridesmaid. He promptly proposed to her, was accepted and the second wedding took place on the spot, after which Carl exclaimed in his wife's ear, "I always did like you best anyway."

A FASCINATING BACHELOR.—Arthur Herrick, a wealthy bachelor, was extremely popular in the village. His good looks, charming manner and hang account, made him the object of the affections of the young women and widows under sixty in the town.

One day an old lady was injured in an automobile accident near his home and was carried into his house by the servants. Arthur arrived and ordered the patient to be made comfortable. Then he engaged a nurse. The women of the village used the accident as a pretext to call at the house, until poor Arthur was almost distracted. The nurse was equal to the situation, however, and gradually worked wonders with the lonely.

Did the nurse care for Arthur? Bless you, no. She never even looked at him. Did Arthur care for the nurse? Ah, that's a different question. Arthur sat and looked at her by the hour. He wished the old lady would never get well.

However, in due time she recovered and then the nurse left. Of course Arthur was lonely, so he sent and found an old and decrepit nurse, brought him to his home, put him to bed and then hired the nurse again. The young nurse soon saw through the trick. She became angry and was about to leave the house, when Arthur resorted to more subterfuge. In suddenly fell sick himself. Then the nurse took pity on him. She consented to nurse him back to health and later on consented to remain with him all her life.

THAT AWFUL BROTHER.—To Phil Harris and his mother in their cozy home came a telegram from Brother John stating that he had been "fired" again, and was coming home by special train riding in a "side-door Pullman."

John arrived considerably soiled and with more than "three sheets in the wind." Just as he was greeting his mother and brother, the latter's sweetheart, with her mother called. Phil quickly got rid of John by giving him some money then, while the two mothers went for an automobile ride. Phil and his sweetheart took a walk. Phil leaving Alice to go to his office.

In the meantime, John had invested his money at a saloon and shortly after leaving the saloon, he encountered Alice. She was frightened and ran, dropping her gloves, a bag and a box of candy. Phil picked them up and exchanged a few her and tried to return them. Alice ran for Phil's home with John close at her heels. Into the house she went and she and a maid ran upstairs and Phil locked a bed. John tried to find them. He opened a closet door in back in which the girls quickly pushed him in and locked the door.

Then they telephoned to Phil that a burglar was in the house. Phil hurried home and with brawn revolver entered the bedroom and cautiously opened the closet door. Out stepped they found John sleeping peacefully on the floor.

MARY'S STRATAGEM.—Desdemona was not the only woman to get trouble over a handkerchief, occurred to Mary also.

Mary was in love with Bill, who worked on her father's farm, and was greatly admired by all the boys. Shorty returned from town one day with a silk handkerchief, which he proudly showed around his mates, strutting in front of Bill to attract his notice. The handkerchief was almost loud enough to speak for itself, so Bill noticed it all right. One of the boys sneaked it from about Shorty's neck and hung it on a nail, where Mary found it. Seeing that it was near the noon hour, about her own comely neck, but alas Cupid's ill luration lessons and assumed her of accepting Rose Shorty.

Hot spirited Mary did not deign to enlighten him, but went for a row on the river. She was assisted by Ludmas and taken below the chief of the tribe, who was reading a big rawe that day.

Mary and a brilliant idea and gracefully laid the leaf that his warriors did not know how to die, of that she could beat them. The idea of the pale-face squaw distancing his braves caused the old chief much merriment, and he arranged a race, with Mary mounted on his own steed.

Mary finished first past the chief's wigwam, but forgot to stop, and soon the entire tribe was after her in pursuit.

In the meantime Bill had gone for a ride in the woods and found the fatal handkerchief, where it had fallen from Mary's neck. He started back on the trail and rescued her and when they returned to the ranch, where Shorty had been awaiting his last fluery, the lovers' quarrel was easily patched up.

THE BUNCO GAME AT LIZARDHEAD.—Jake Walters and his wife, Millie, arrive at Lizard Head. Among those named that Mrs. Biles, proprietress of the hotel, has advertised for a waitress and Millie is sent to take the position. Millie is pretty and soon has all the village swains bleating their necks to gain her favor. From among Millie's co-"hick" Hodgkiss, a cowboy within a radius of ten miles of Lizard Head is not to believe that he is the prize lady's choice. At this moment Jake gets the one and inviting himself down with a dozen versions of "How to Make Love," he needs Sonny Walters and pours him gore leaving up all the locks that Jake has with him in the hotel that there are at the agent and that it is the ungodliest for him to be the books fall into other hands. At every person Jake sells the other books he goes down the line and fall to become that long never a sooner on the matter. All the bokos purpose to Millie, each intending to be her beau and each quite Millie observes his scarcer. It is then that Jake discovers as a widower, and presents Millie, who seems to be thrilled by the news. Not until Jake had Millie more enough his out of a deputing case. So the boys realize how completely they have been stung.

HOLDING HIS OWN.—Newsman Powers is the proud father of a baby boy of three weeks. Being a newspaper man he observes an assignment from his paper to go to San Francisco. Three months later he arrives in Chicago and leaving the depot goes up to the elevated station to catch a train for his home. He is followed into the car by a nurse carrying a baby, who seating herself behind Powers suddenly remembers she has left the baby's coat on the station platform. Hearing the baby in Powers' arms she runs out on the platform, when the train starts ahead and she is left behind. At the next station the exasperated newspaper man, thinking of his and the child thereof upon him, as Jacobs suggested, were the persecutors arrest him for kidnapping. He is taken to the station, where later the nurse and the mother who have come for the train, identify Powers as the villain. And the mother, who then turns to have one look at the "stranger" sees it is her husband! THE OTHER MAN.—Again and again Ruth Benson had overlooked the carelessness of her maid, Lucy. This morning however she had not only broken a cut glass bowl, but also a couple of pieces of her best china, and Ruth's patience was at an end.

Neal Benson had gone to the office and little Ida to the park with her nurse, when upon coming into the sitting-room after her wages, Lucy beheld her mistress in the arms of a tall stranger, and heard the couple exercise the oath at which they would have luncheon.

Here was an opportunity to get even with Mrs. Benson, so listening to the 'phone, she called up the astonished husband, and advised him of his wife's whereabouts. Although ashamed of himself for being influenced by Lucy's gossip, Neal sprang into his auto and was soon at the house. Here, still a half-smoked cigarette attracted his attention, then the first page of a letter commencing, "Dear Little Girl" and stating that the writer would arrive that morning. So the maid had been right after all. Once more Neal jumped into his auto and sped to the cafe, only to learn that Mrs. Benson, whom one of the waiters recognized, had just left with her escort.

A wild chase followed. However, the auto reached the house first and the couple were bending over a diamond ring when Neal burst into the hall. As he stepped to the doorway and raised his revolver, the stranger turned—and the amazed husband beheld Irving Bradford, his father-in-law, who, having returned from abroad, had at once hurried to his daughter's to give her the first ride in his new car.

Pulling himself together as best he could, Neal entered to greet his rival, and although that greeting was somewhat hysterical, neither father nor daughter suspected the real cause.

her mother entered and ordered Bob from the home.

Gambler Joe was about to call on the widow's daughter when he saw Bob coming out. He is about to fulfill his oath to shoot Bob on sight, when he notes the man's unsteady steps. Leading the lad to the hotel, he leaves him in the office to fetch a visiting doctor. While gone a bunch of cowboys enter, and not knowing his plight, they pitch in and commence to forcibly settle their grudge, until interrupted by Neil, who enlightens them as to his condition.

The doctor examined Bob's eyes and announced that five months' rest and treatment under his care with a thousand dollar fee would restore his sight. Gambler Joe passes his hat and it is quickly jammed with bills and silver, all prompted by the common feeling for an afflicted fellow-man. Touched by the unadorned generosity of these big-hearted Westerners, the doctor returns their offering and gives his services free to Bob, who after the allotted time, returns to his little sweetheart, safe and sound, uplifted out of the dark.

COL. E. D. BAKER, 1ST. CALIFORNIA.—James Thornton and Jim is beloved by the beautiful Marjorie Caselton. He has for a rival the young Sheriff of the village, George Haskan, who being rejected by the fair Marjorie, is bitterly vindictive towards Thornton, and only awaits an opportunity to visit vengeance upon him.

The War of Secession is inflaming the young blood over the entire country and the patriotic fever is disrupting hearts and homes. But Jim Thornton, though loving the National Flag with deep ardor, does not rush to defend its serenity, because he is the sole support of his aged and widowed mother.

Tom Devins, a friend of Jim's father, and a participant in the Mexican War, but now a Federal major, brings the news to Jim of the pending strife, and expecting the lad to shoulder a musket, is indignant at his refusal. The sacrificing mother, however, tearful and trembling, gives up her Jim to the Northern cause.

Then does Sheriff Haskan renew his advances to

CLARK'S CAPTURE OF KASKASKIA.—Fort Kaskaskia was the first to succumb to George Roger Clark's intrepid dash. The British feared him. He defended the settlers in Kentucky, and shattered the army of the traitor, Arnold.

The supercilious English Lord Lounsberry, felt secure in his pride, when through a stern parent's connivance right from the arms of her lover, George Clark. But he is not aware of the prowess of the American trapper.

A ball is being given in honor of the bride-to-be. Finely clad ladies of surpassing loveliness, dance on the arms of their splendidly bedecked cavaliers. Wine is flowing freely and mirth runs high, when like a thunderbolt in their midst, stands the redoubtable Clark.

The guard has been overpowered by the stealthy and brave woodman. Then tragedy a flashing sword finds swift and sure lodgment against his rival's breast. The flag on the fort is pulled down and his own run up in its stead, there to stay for all time to come, and in his arms, once more he holds the lovely girl for whom he would brave the dangers of Hell itself, and whose love is as strong for him as his for his country.

OUT OF THE DARK.—A cowbor dance at Roaring Canyon was always a gala occasion. Also, it was never free from a row and in this instance Redeyed Bob slant the hot contents of Smoke's head, because the latter tried to force Bob's sweetheart to dance with him.

Shortly after the dance, the escaping smoke from the store so distressed Bob's eyes, that in his rage he kicked it over. Soon the place was in flames and Bob was ejected with the dire threat of being shot should he ever return to Roaring Canyon.

While crossing the country, he became blind. Groping his way to his pony, he mounted and gave it the rein. Without being discovered, he found his way to his sweetheart's home and made known his condition. Before the frightened girl could act,

Marjorie, and by reason of his constant exploitation of Jim's slim chances of returning, the girl accepts him and exacts his promise to care for Jim's mother as well.

Jim is fighting bravely for Old Glory under the valiant ex-Senator, Col. Baker, commanding the 1st California, when he learns the awful news by letter from home. An awful frenzy soars through him, and forgetting all else, deserts his regiment. He is apprehended at home by Sheriff Haskan, who hurries him back to his commandant. Disgrace and death confront him! But the heartrending letter from his mother and his own previous bravole fighting, soften his superiors and Jim is restored to his company.

Then follows the terrible engagement at Balls Bluff and wherein Col. Baker is struck down and Jim is made the very forefront rescuing the colors. Rapid promotion is given him and a secret commission whereby he is granted leave with his men to carry a week at home.

At this juncture, Haskan has formulated his plans so that Marjorie is at last to become his bride. The fatal "yes" is about to be pronounced when in bursts Jim and his men. Haskan skulks off discomfited and Jim reaps his reward by uniting in wedlock with his fair Marjorie.

MAKING A MAN OF HIS SON.—Convinced that his son was padding the payroll of the ranch hands, Col. Baker decides to do a little thinking, so the boy returns from a ride with his sweetheart, the Colonel confronts him with the evidence of his peculations, and informs him that he will have to take the consequences. If it should even take him to jail.

True to his word, his son is arrested and sentenced to five years in the penitentiary. The father takes this course believing it to be the only means of reformation. After a few violent outbursts, in which he displays a healthy portion of his father's force of will, the lad accepts the situation and takes his medicine.

While in jail, his cellmate and he become fast friends, and before leaving the prison, he vows an eternal friendship for his new-found comrade, giving his word of honor, that when the other shall have served his term, to look him up and he will help him. At the expiration of his sentence, the boy goes home to his father and requests a reinstatement to his old position, which plea his father unhesitatingly complies with.

Assuming charge of the payroll again, he is at once pleased and surprised to find that the money carried to compensate him now, and putting it aside, he retires for the night. Attracted by his window being opened from the outside, he is delighted to see his old cellmate enter still in stripes. Having escaped jail, as he tells the boy, he has gone south for the winter and all. The latter, back knowing that he is in no position to proffer assistance. The convict, discovering the money for the payroll, pleads and begs for some to help him get away. The colonel's son is steadfast in his refusal, and turns the jailbird away, who muttering curses, leaves by the window.

The next morning the boy is in ecstacies to find his father and the convict in friendly conversation. He then learns the truth. The Colonel had obtained the convict's release from the governor for the sacrifice of his son's standing as a character, and he was now proudly enjoying his success in making a man of his son.

THE PILLARS OF SOCIETY.—Young Bernick and Johan Tonnesen are close friends, living in Norway. Bernick is engaged to marry Johan's sister, who is an actress. He is willing to marry her for her money, as he is really in love with the wife of an actor. While on a visit to his old love, in which he hopes to break off the affair, the woman's husband unexpectedly enters the room, and Bernick is compelled to escape by the window.

Johan, upon learning of his friend's threatened disgrace assumes Bernick's guilt, and leaves the country for America. Bernick is thankful for his friend's chivalry by allowing it to be generally believed that Johan also misappropriated funds. In reality Bernick is the guilty one, Johan the scapegoat.

Bernick marries the heiress and takes up his position as one of "the pillars of society" in the community in which he lives, bearing an unsullied reputation.

When twelve years later, Johan returns to his native country, he falls in love with a beautiful girl his sister has adopted. She returns his affection but when the rector tells her that this is the man who many years before, wrecked her mother's happiness, her love turns to misery. Johan then demands that Bernick clear his good name, but Bernick refuses and Johan is going to his native home. Johan leaves to return to America in order to get letters which Bernick wrote, in which he confessed his guilt. Johan is to sail on the same ship which Bernick knows to be unseaworthy, and which plans to see in a storm. Bernick expects hopes that the ship will be lost, so that Johan cannot bring back his evidence.

Bernick's little son, however, who is the joy of his father's life, is greatly taken with his uncle from America, and decides to stow away on the ship in which he sails.

Bernick is terror stricken when he learns of his son's action, and is convinced that he will never see his child again. But the lad is safely returned to him, and the experience so chastens his father's spirit that Bernick confesses his guilt to the townsmen, telling them he has lived a lie for many years, but in the future they must know him as he is, for no innocent man will again take upon himself guilt which in reality belongs to Consul Bernick.

Bernick's wife, in the fullness of her love, freely forgives her husband, and Johan weds the girl of his choice.

THE SINNER.—A young priest happens to be passing along a street just as a man is run down by a auto. He goes to his assistance, and at the victim's request accompanies him in an ambulance to the hospital.

On the way, the wounded man, who believes that he is dying, confesses that in a fit of drunken rage, he had killed his uncle, a rich merchant, because he was refused money.

The priest's own father, it appears, was employed by this man, and a few months before the tragedy, had led a delegation of employees who had protested against a cut in wages. The leader, derided and humiliated, lost his temper, and made threats against the rich man. Thus, when the killing was discovered, the priest's father fell under suspicion and a strong circumstantial case evolved against him.

After the arrest the priest realized that he held his father's fate in his own hands, but his vows prevented him from saving him. The sinner, who died soon after, repented of his confession, and refused to take the blame that belonged to him, preferring to let an innocent man suffer.

At the trial the old man was convicted. His son, his heart torn with anguish, still declined to speak. He says farewell to his father, and watches an officer approach to lead him to a cell. Then he turns to leave the court, his lips still sealed.

But the stronger regrets at last moment. The priest's anguish touches even his selfish heart. He falls on his knees and admits his crime. Agony and excitement overpower him, and he falls dead, while the prison kisses beside him and prays that God will forgive the sinner, who repented, even if it was at the eleventh hour.

THE FAIR DENTIST.—Claude Marlow, Eugene Wilson and Fred Strong pose as a trio of masters whom women cannot resist. They find time hanging heavily on their hands, when the message is relieved by Edith Morton, a dentist.

She is first noticed by Claude Marlow, who observes her enter her home in which her dental office is located. Marlow repairs to his club, where he raves of her beauty to Wilson and Strong.

They are gazing out of the window when they see her passing. Not knowing she is the object of Marlow's raving declamation, they follow the acknowledged connoisseur of beauty to her office, where Marlow's affliction is diagnosed as a pretense of being admitted to the parlors of the fair dental extractor.

Marlow arouses first and is ushered in by a maid. He is in the throes of a jumping toothache apparently but is cheerily congratulating himself that he will be admitted into the seclusion of the dental office. She gives a critical look at the alleged aching tooth. She extracts the tooth, and sends him out of the room in pain after receiving her fee.

In turn Wilson and Strong appear in the waiting room confident that the others are blissfully ignorant of any other intent than a visit to the dental office to be relieved of pain. They try to flirt with her, but she resists them.

Just as the young woman dentist has had it brought home to them that they have been circumvented by the dentist and that they have all visited the office on the same errand, there is handed another surprise in store. The dentist comes into the reception room and gives them the laugh and, opening the street door, ushers in a man whom she introduces as her husband.

FOUR LIVES.—Nelson the gayest man in the party, attempts a passionate embrace as they say farewell for him. A vision of a happy home appears. Nelson comes in happy and is greeted affectionately by his wife. His baby is in the cradle and he kisses it. An ideal home and this vision disappears.

Horrid, ghastly scenes of the gaols with lines of care on his face, is affected. He begins to pray with, "Well, not crime, I once had a happy home, but——" A vision of a home in ruins of life is unfolded. He returns home to his luxurious apartments, plainly infatuated. He drinks and is misplored by his wife to desist. He is resentful. Her interference and seeks a hasty escape by burning the wantons to her pleadings. He goes away.

Maxwell is urged to tell his story, and he begins by saying, "I went on a journey once and when I returned——" Shady off at Nelson's family and her lover being surprised in the home of Maxwell to a compromising position. Maxwell punishes the man and throws him out of his house. Then sinks on a divan, broken hearted, as the vision passes.

Baldwin is the last to tell his story at the request of his companions somewhat saying, "Death robbed me of the only woman I ever loved." The vision appears and he is seen at the bedside of a beautiful young woman, who dies—a pathetic scene. As the vision fades he is surrounded by scientific men and Baldwin's aged mother enters the room as he sits in meditation, saying, "He's come to restore." She leads him away as the lights are extinguished.

FOR HER BROTHER'S SAKE.—Hiram Flint, an embittered money grabber and tormentor, lives with his daughter Madge and her brother Max. Father pushes him. He buys a mortgage on the farm of Spearman, a neighbor. Flint refuses to renew on the mortgage is due. The farmer gives one month to his son, vows to pay Flint. Owen is easily influenced. Urged to fall in love with Madge, he is persuaded to gamble and loses the money at roulette. Owen goes home and is censured by Madge.

James Spearman is quite a horseman and has shown to many a horse that his master has never been tamed. The latter is the property of Flint's brother and sister in governing over the ways of the money Madge and Max. Owen, on the embezzlement of the money, falls in which a large purse is offered by the Flint's. Then commences the rides of attaching their horses to the race. Owen has a runaway of travel and has injured the Spearman's son. Flint's horse is victorious.

Flint returns in a well known trick of instruments and drives the Spearmans' home on the eve of the race. Flint's daughter and son are in the party. Owen has an unsatisfying sense of the meddlers as the two spoil expenses that he has been engaged to Flint. They leave the party. Flint's horse is victorious. Flint is to be ousted on the next evening in the house of Flint. Owen is to be ousted on the next evening in the house of Flint. Owen is to be ousted on the next evening in the house of Flint. Owen is to be ousted on the next evening in the house of Flint.

Flint is pathetic, thinking some unexperienced rider has the money. The horses approach the line. The start is made with the Spearmans' horse well in front with Owen up as exercise rider. The position in the grand stand are unfortunately, men are from a mode, police in and out mingling, crowd, approximately and hopeful. The horses flash past the stand at the half with Madge riding her mount like a veteran in the saddle. She is well up to

YANKEE.

IN SUNNY ITALY—Nero, a pretty Italian blood vehicle, leaves home for one day's vending among the customers who visit the pretty western resort.

A group of Americans in the vicinity of Naples start under the watchful eye of his parents seek for choice flowers and unconsciously loose his hand to her which causes Nero, in her donkey driver, to become grieved with jealousy. The American lads has been the unfortunate cause of her woe and renews interest so agreeable to her that she can't keep her love the inside Yankee lad.

Narrow circumstances keeps the Italian maidens that see among the American. So Nero angles at him, followed with tuge and pull, he gets over a hedges, till where she lands into the sea, the water not seem, deep enough to break her fall, so Nero with a heroic dive, rescues her, and some Italian fishermen who are dragging there fish nets through the surf and carried to her home.

Narrow lines to those Americans that have seen, but the boy is soon vindicated in a novel manner and he decides to remain and offer protection to the suffering girl. The parents of the boy and girl have become reconciled to conditions existing between the young couple and all ends happily.

THE ANGELUS BELL.—The ringing of the Angelus, which causes a beautiful young girl to pause in the step she is about to take in leaving her dear old daddy to go forth in the world in the company of an artist who has become smitten with her beauty and who has told her about the wonderful city he was going to take her to, but as she sees her dear daddy in decent prayer and listens to the Angelus, a moral sense of duty, the object of his attention and the pleasant home safe in the keeping of her loving parents.

LUX.

BILL AS A TOREADOR.—Bill is wandering along the street vainly endeavoring to attract the attention of a lady, when he is brought to a halt by a large notice, "Bull Fight Today." The letters and Bill follows, but he is rudely ejected, as only persons in fancy dress costume are admitted. So Bill tries to a second hand clothes shop for his bill up, and soon he enters the bull ring garbed as a toreador. There are crowds of people, the lights, the glitter of costumes, the smiles of the fair and the gay sounds of laughter Bill searches for the object of his affections, but cannot find her, soon rewarded, for he discovers her sitting in the shade, and fortunitly flops down upon his knees and proposes. Seeing the color of his lover's costume, the maiden decided to have a little fun, and so she enlists the assistance of two other members of the party. Throwing a bull's skin over themselves and completing the disguise with the assistance of a head with horns attached, these two conspirators charge into the room. The maiden then tells Bill that if he will fight the bull she will favor his suit. Bill, not being a bull expert in full gallop is enough, however, for poor Bill, whose little heart goes pitter pat, and he commences his little legs begin to move violently and he puts his best leg foremost pursued by the bull. He meets two patrolmen, who immediately consult the official book of rules, which says: "When there is trouble about to be sure to put 'em or three blocks between that and you for valuable property." This they do and with sincerity. The sport then commences to shed equanimity and their lives on exciting time in the course of their flight. But when it is discovered that the bull really is there is a hot time for poor Bill.

FASHION AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.—The baron skirt is all the go just now, so this comedy is well timed. Mrs. Brown is fascinated by the latest fad and arrays herself in one of these creations. She attracts attention, much attention, the cream of the attention is a necessity and goes to sleep on a seat in the park. She is wearing a saucy hat, which the children despoil while she is slumbering. During the excitement and bustle of the morning she has torn the dress. Part of her skirt and her general appearance is very similar to that of an Algerian soldier. There is a chance for a harmless patrolman to commit a blunder, and he does. He mistakes her for one of the Algerian contingent on furlough and arrests her for not being fully equipped. She is conveyed to the barracks, placed in a cell for disobedience and given a rough time generally. Finally the long suffering son-in-law appears upon the scene and the matter is put right. A laugh from beginning to end.

ECLAIR.

A VILLAGE FLIRT.—Silas, a pretentious young "rube," delights in impugning upon the simplicity of the village girls. He is always seeing a chance to make his declarations of affection, whenever he finds one of the girls alone, and so great is his enjoyment derived from an uninterrupted flirtation, that he seldom misses an opportunity. So engaging are his manners, and so honeyed the words that fall from his flattering lips, that the girls are easily vanquished by his attentions, and believe all the promises he makes them, without any hesitation or misgiving. Silas is a firm believer in that he is deserving them, and they glad together a means by which they may make a fool of their neighbor, young neighbor.

Accordingly, they induce him to visit the farm, one day, which they know before hand to be "wash day." The great bustle is placed in the shed, immediately beneath the hay loft. The girls stood expectantly, patiently and quietly, the time, which lends from the hay loft into the shed below, they cover the opening with hay, and then pour down upon his unsuspecting head, a large water. When this is accomplished, one of the girls who has fixed him for that the secret is to be up to the hay loft, by some pretext or other she first sees a good opportunity to make love to the girl, and when in the loft, to climb up from the outside by means of a ladder. He is so ardent in his demonstrations of love to the fair maiden, that before she knows it, she has fallen through the trapdoor into the tub of tepid water below. Her fall is accidental, though he appears much less attractive to the girls than heretofore, and heartily is the laugh that goes round at his expense.

AMERICAN.

TWO PLUCKY GIRLS.—Joel Bigelow has just sold his crop of corn, and has departed for the bank and deposit it, he leaves it in his house. Unfortunately he receives a telegram that his brother has met with a serious accident, and that he is needed at once. Mrs. Bigelow and he depart in a hurry, leaving the money upon which their daughter, Mabel. In the course of the day, Mabel's cousin, finding her alone in the house, offers to stay with her during the night. Just as they feared, a burglar arrives.

In the meantime, Mr. and Mrs. Bigelow find that the telegram was a forgery, so they make all haste back to the house, only to find the girls holding two desperate characters.

ONE MONTH TO LIVE.—Mr. Jack Jones, a young business man, was so fond of convivial company that he neglected to neglect his business. One morning he goes to his office, and during his absence Mrs. Jones entertains her old school friend, accompanied by her consumptive husband. Mr. Jones, finding business dull, goes out with some of his happy go-lucky cronies, and returns to his office in the afternoon in a state of mild liquor. Mrs. Jones is instantly alarmed and, remembering the consumptive husband, she following upon calling in a physician, who, upon seeing the patient, promptly diagnoses the case "plain drunk," and takes his departure. The following morning Mrs. Jones receives a note from Mrs. Smith informing her that the physician attending Mr. Smith had announced that he had but one month to live. Mrs. Jones' heart goes out in sympathy for her friend, and then noticing the name, Jack, only is used, determines to give her husband a lasting lesson. Accordingly she pieces the note and puts pen to ink, and writes her a note in which he enters the dining room. Although he is suffering from the effects of his debauch, the note overwhelms him into action. Taking it to mean none other than himself, a month of terror follows. The physician's examination, his every conduct, paying close attention to business details. Near the end of the given time Mr. Jones has in reality come to himself and, when his wife receives a letter from Mrs. Smith, telling her that Jack is dead. She shows the letter to her husband, who hastily compares the two letters, and discovers the handwriting to be the same. He immediately addresses his better self, and promises never again to indulge in excessive stimulants.

BUD NEVINS—BAD MAN.—Ches Riley, the wealthy owner of Riley's Ranch, had incurred the enmity of a rival ranch owner, who, with hatred seething in his heart, plotted with Bud Nevins, the notorious bad man of the community to put him out of the way. Before starting on his mission Bud, ever quarrelsome, has a fierce encounter with a half-breed Indian, incurring his lasting hatred, and with the persistency of his race he follows Bud, intent upon revenge.

To Riley's astonishment Bud receives to apply for work at the ranch, and in order to conceal his identity, he shaves off his mustache, which alters his personal appearance. Continuing on his way he encounters a young girl who had been thrown from her horse, and is in consequence suffering a sprained ankle. He assists her to mount and resumes his journey.

Arrived at the ranch he is immediately employed by Ches Riley to assist at the spring roundup, and discovers that the girl he had assisted is the daughter of the man he had agreed to kill. In the meantime the half-breed, nursing his wrath, had patiently waited his chance to kill Nevins. The opportunity came on the morning of the roundup, and also Nevins' chance to fulfill his agreement; but Bud Nevins had learned to love Ches Riley's daughter, and he found, when his opportunity came, he had not the heart to kill the father of the woman he loved. In his eagerness to destroy his enemy, the half-breed's aim was faulty and the bullet intended for Bud Nevins injured Ches Riley. Bud immediately retaliates, but misses the half-breed, who, on his second shot seriously injures Bud, who falls from his horse to the ground.

The cowboys hear the fusillade of shots and start rapidly to the scene of action, as does also Ches Riley's daughter, who is on her way to watch the roundup. Mr. Riley has recovered sufficiently to explain to the cowboys who immediately start in pursuit of the half-breed while the daughter rushes to the unconscious Nevins, who is tenderly lifted and conveyed to the ranch house to be nursed back to life with loving care. Ches has learned to love him. The cowboys capture the half-breed and he is hustled out to him in the stern court of Judge Lynch.

THE BOSS OF LUCKY RANCH.—When young Jack Thompson was sent by his father to his old school friend and cousin, Tom Harding he left an environment of culture and refinement to enter upon the life of a cowboy.

Endowed by nature with the very spirit of the West, manliness and honor, he entered with satisfaction into the new order of things. The cowboys were inclined to resent the intrusion of the tenderfoot, and one, Bill Crowley, became his little nemesis. So sure was he that he would be, he made a marked impression on Tom Harding's lovely daughter, Ethel in every possible way to discredit Jack, and one day when Jack and Miss Harding were riding, he insolently stopped her horse, and when Jack resenting the intrusion, Crowley held him up at the point of his gun. In the face of certain destruction, Jack Thompson considered discretion the better part of valor, but he determined then and there to even up the score.

On leaving the ranch that night, Miss Harding accompanied by his pretty daughter, rode out to inspect his cattle, and Crowley, to belittle Jack, deliberately set fire to the prairie, which was at an end, and, although Crowley drove his gun, Thompson gave his tormentor a severe trouncing. Mr. Harding, it is determined to shift several successions by Bill's inattention to his work immediately discharges him, and consolidated Jack on his manly handling of the situation.

Crowley, humiliated and angry, determined to be revenged, and, with whom could, and found cattle rustler.

The work at the ranch continued the same, rounding up strays, dipping the cattle to prevent disease, etc., when the owner noticed that some cattle had been disappearing in small numbers from the herd. Accordingly, he called the boys together and told them they must put an end to the thieving tactics of the cattle rustlers. Jack Thompson immediately starts out, and is riding along alert and watchful when he observes two of the cowboys in close conference on the street. He hastily dismounts and makes his way stealthily behind a tree, and overhears the information thrown to Crowley. Crowley, startled, immediately draws his gun and goes in the direction of the suspicious sound, when Thompson darts from his hiding place and with one well-directed blow fells the other rustler to the ground. Ejecting the shells from the visitor's gun, he hides behind the steer to await the return of Crowley, and the instant that he reappears covers him with his gun. Handing the prisoner back with his prisoners, he is heartily welcomed by all, and Mr. Harding announces that Jack will be the foreman of the ranch. Miss Harding's reward to him is a contract for life.

POWERS.

THE CRISIS.—All who read this may not have been in the position of Paul Cummings, who becomes a father for the first time. In another room carefully guarded by nurses and doctors, his little wife, Polly, lies between life and death. Attempts to enter the room are gently frustrated. He is frantic, maddened by the suspense, and the doctor finally decides that Paul must be taken into a restful stupor. While asleep he sees the entire past before him—how he met Polly, their courtship and the happy day when he made her his own. And when he awakens he finds that three of the doctors have been summoned to keep his company and divert his attentions from the door leading to Polly's room. They are successful and told him all is well with his wife and child. Doctor emerges from the room with a burden in his arms—a baby boy! Paul understands from the nurse's smile they all is well with Polly, and proceeds to go into the usual ecstasy. His friends do a hardance with him, but while they are doing so gleefully, out comes the doctor with the howling second half of a twin! And both boys, too; what more does anybody want?

THE JOYS OF PERSECUTION.—When two old daddies show too plainly that they want their son and daughter to marry the couple in question, while they like each other well enough, are apt to feel themselves being forced. It happens so in this case, and before the fond father can realize it the children resent it and shun one another. The daddies are flustered, and call in their friend, the parson, who gives them practical advice. They follow it by pretending to be angry with one another when they meet their offspring, they each lastruct their own, violently, that there can be no marriage. The son and daughter are puzzled, and with true contrariness, oppose the parents, declaring great love for one another. There are several stormy scenes in which the parents demonstrate their stern anger, and finally, when they think they have carried it far enough, they both give in and pretend to wake up. Then the preacher gets in his fine professional work.

THE AWAKENING OF GALATEA—Pygmalion, who has carved out the beautiful figure of Galatea. He gets several offers for its purchase, but to go on to the World that Galatea must part with it.

One day as he sits in his studio he hears a voice calling him by name. He knows that there is nobody in the room, and is bewildered. Finally he drops into the chair which hides the figure of Galatea and is stupefied to find her alive. He leads her down from the pedestal and discloses to her that she is now in the world, answering her inquiries. He finds the incarnation as beautiful as his masterwork, but as he falls in love with her, there enters an element of jealousy on the part of those who do not understand the situation. Some regard Galatea to grieve, and they Pygmalion come out of this trance she stepped back on the pedestal and the transformation takes place, for while a beautiful Galatea is again turned to the stone from which the sculptor's mallet had shaped her.

AMBROSIO.

THE QUARTERMASTER.—Peter is a gunner on a warship and the fiance of Elsie. The quartermaster, John, an unsuccessful rival, and addicted to drink, takes advantage of his rank to humiliate and bully Peter. One day, while intoxicated, John ridicules himself upon Elsie, and is thrashed by Peter, who is arrested. The humiliated quartermaster loses his balance and falls into the sea and Peter rescues him. This brings courtesies from Joseph, and he asks Peter's forgiveness for his actions, and pledges his friendship.

BISON.

AN INDIAN'S AMBITION.—On his dying bed, Chief Tecumseh entrusts his son, Red Eagle, to Father Francis, who educates the boy at the mission near the fort. Grown to manhood, Red Eagle is engaged as a scout, and wins a soldier's love. He is presented with an American flag by the Colonel's daughter, Belle. Red Eagle later meets Belle in the woods as she is being frightened by an Indian, and he thrashes her admirer. The other Indians shoots at them and wounds the wounding Red Eagle. Belle's engagement to Henri, Ellsworth is announced, and at a farewell banquet Henri's friend Rolf plans to kill the rival. Rolf refuses to drink a toast to Ellsworth, and is struck by the lieutenant. Red Eagle retaliates and is arrested and placed in the guard house. The other Indian sets the place on fire and escapes. Making his way to Ellsworth's room he locks himself with the lieutenant, vanquishing him, and then ends his own life.

A BOY MAN'S GRATITUDE.—Wounded and robbed by three desperadoes, the Indian seeks refuge at the pioneer's cabin, where his wound is dressed and he is given food and shelter. The desperadoes overpower the pioneer and compel his daughter to accompany them on horseback, and the Indian and pioneer pursue them, form a scuffle and get the drop on them. The Indian then ignits a duel with them, one by one, in which he is victorious.

RELIANCE.

SUCH IS THE KINGDOM.—George Williams, a young and newly ordained minister, is assigned to a church and falls in love with the old parishioner's daughter, Gladys, becomes inclined with a desire to leave the quiet little town, and even asks the city to seek employment at the stage. Her father is furious and disowns her. One day two little girls of a neighbor run to the parsonage in search of their father, who wishes to whip them for the lies. Jenkins remonstrates with the angry man and asks him to let he would teach by love and forgiveness and not with the rod, and the father takes his girls in his arms and promises never to be harsh again. Gladys is soon disillusionized, being unable to secure employment and prudently returns to her home. Jenkins orders her out and when Williams intercedes for her he loses his temper. Williams, angry and disgusted at the religious hypocrisy of his other man who teaches his flock tenets which he refuses to apply to his own child, roundly scores Jenkins and impiously tears the image of the Savior from around his neck and throws it on the table, exclaiming: "If that is your religion I don't want it." Shocked to a sense of realization of his actions Jenkins rushes out, calls back his daughter, takes her tenderly in his arms and gratefully shakes the hand of the young minister who showed him the true light.

LOCKED OUT—The president of the works, obdurate, has ground down his employees till they revolt and call a strike. He refuses to listen to the rest of his directors, and calls in imported colored help, protected by private detectives. A demonstration at the works by the men is quickly checked by the detectives, who shoot down the protesting strikers. A bomb is effectively carried out, and the families of the strikers are in dire straits. The hungry mothers with their babies in their arms call upon Jenness and plead with him to put their husbands back to work, but he has them ejected from his house. Finally a crowd surrounds his residence and to disperse them he orders his guards to fire into their midst. When the smoke rolls away men and women are seen lying on the ground. Horror stricken, his wife turns away from him in revulsion and leaves him forever. A realization of his awful deed finally strikes him. Visions of his victims rise up to face him. Jenness' mind gives way. Overcome with terror and remorse, the weakened heart of the old man succumbs and he passes away.

GREAT NORTHERN.

THE LUCKY BANANA SELLER.—This is a comedy in which the banana seller purchases a lottery ticket and wins a big prize. He gives up business, and sees the gentleman with most amusing results.

A WOULD-BE SPORTSMAN.—A portly old fellow, desiring to go out shooting, arrays himself with great care in what evidently considers to be the correct shooting costume, and, tended by a page boy, starts forth for a day's sport. The good man is quite oblivious of the many comments of passers-by. He brings down a number of birds with his gun, but pays no attention to the ground game, he empties a charge into a fine, fat beast, which turns out to be a man. The sportsman is the subject of large claims for compensation. This so upsets him that, meeting two policemen, he persuades one of them to give him a fishing rod in exchange for his gun, and proceeds to engage in the more peaceful pursuit of angling. Before long a dead cat, one of the lucky angler tumbles into the water, and decides to have no more sport for that day.

SOLAX.

SUSCEPTIBLE DAD.—George Nelson, a wealthy writer, meets young Hughes, who is looking with too kindly an eye upon his handsome young secretary, Hazel Lee, but pays who runs other plans for the future of the girl. Others differ from the house Marie, however, has no idea of giving in to dad so readily, she suggests to Harry that he impersonate a school girl chum, and this attired, call to see her.

So Dad and Hazel may be make that immediately upon his arrival dad falls a victim to the charms of his daughter's friend. After papa has demonstrated that he is a regular "mash" with the ladies her flowers, candy and all the other things dear to the heart of a young miss, her identity is exposed. While dad is a bit chagrined at first, he soon sees the funny side of the situation, and amid laughter and merry-making the old man gives his blessing.

THEIR FIRST BABY.—John Harvey objects to his daughter's marrying Jack Bay. The young couple plan an elopement. After they are married, poverty overtakes them. Jack is out of work and the newlyweds are compelled to write to her father, telling him that a baby has been born to them and that he has been named after John. Father Harvey is overjoyed at the folks and sends them a telegram telling them to expect him. Jack, reading the telegram, tells Jo, in, goes in search of a baby, and his quest is rewarded. He sees a baby in a perambulator and promptly steals it. The two conspirators, warned and from information received from a messenger boy, starts in pursuit of the thief. A mob gathers and they make a rush for Jack's home and discover the father and his daughter with the baby. They have the girl arrested for kidnapping and are on the way to the station when Jack decides to put matters right and tells the officers they have arrested the wrong party. The father listens and hearing the joke is tickled amused and slipping a few greenbacks into the ready palm of the policeman, the happy family take their way homeward.

REX.

THE ULTIMATE SACRIFICE—There are two men in the world who love Dorothy and who want to love in return and there are women who want to be loved by two men, Lucien and Jim Dale. Dorothy is a beautiful girl, full of life and of spirit, and appears in their midst.

FROM THE THOUSAND ISLANDS.

Clayton, N. Y., April 10, 1911

Editors Moving Picture World, New York.

I am enclosing clipping from Syracuse Post Standard, a daily paper of wide circulation in this north country, which might be of interest, inasmuch as it shows some progress in the way of an admission by the general press as to the real situation in the motion picture business.

"The low cost of admission has made the moving picture shows a great amusement to poor people, and, rightly managed, may be of benefit. They are better than the cheap theaters, which they have so largely supplanted." Is a very broad admission indeed, and it is gratifying to note that so popular a daily is one of the first to give such publicity.

I sincerely congratulate the "Post Standard."

Yours truly, A. K. ICKER.

GROWING CIRCUIT IN PORTLAND, OREGON.

Melvin G. Winstock, general manager of the People's Amusement Company, of Portland, Oregon, informs us that the company has taken ten years lease of the Grand Theater, of Vancouver, Washington, a completely equipped opera house, with a seating capacity of eight hundred. This house cost not less than fifty thousand dollars in building, and the company will show nothing but the best in motion pictures and high class music will be furnished. The company has also taken a long lease on a motion picture theater being erected by Mr. E. M. Baker on Killings-worth and Albina Avenues, an excellent residential section of Portland, to cost not less than fifteen thousand dollars, and to seat four hundred or more. They have also taken a lease on a building at First and Alder Streets, Portland, which the superintendent of construction will alter into a modern theater. These two theaters will show only the best in motion pictures, with appropriate music. They have also recently expended fifteen thousand dollars in redecorating and improving the Star Theater, of Portland, which is the principal theater of the company. They have added three hundred to the seating capacity, and made the house more beautiful, both inside and outside.

NEW MANAGER AT THE "GLOBE," BROCKTON, MASS.

Thomas S. Powers, well known in many of the big daily newspaper offices of the country, has embarked in the moving picture business. He has taken an interest in the Globe, Brockton, Mass., and is resident manager of that house, exhibiting moving pictures and illustrated songs. The Globe was opened nearly a year ago, but was a failure until taken over by Messrs. Kerr & Woodhead, both well known men in Boston. C. Eugene Wilson, local manager, was succeeded by Mr. Powers March 4, and the latter, with the assistance of F. H. Jacques on the program end, has the people already coming to the number of 12,000 per week. With 1,120 seating capacity nothing but Independent films are shown. Six or seven pictures are given with four songs, making a full two-hour show.

Mr. Powers was for 15 years circulation manager of the Worcester (Mass.) Telegram, and for the past six years circulation manager of the Boston (Mass.) Herald.

THE FLICKERING FILM.

Editorial in the N. Y. Independent for April.

One hears much denunciation of moving picture shows as a demoralizing influence. Moving pictures as they are represented, certainly a grave menace, poisoning our boys and girls, as seems, so large a proportion of the visitors are children, or at least minors. Our own observation, however, shows that the pictures and wordless dramas offered are, for the most part, more clean and less silly than the usual entertainment of the so-called actors' stage. What is more, the standard is rising, whether one gauges it from the boilerplate standpoint or from the moral. Many of the films show scenes that stimulate wholesome laughter such as is seldom heard at performances of imported farce at two dollars a seat. There is nothing inherently vicious about the silent stage. It has cut deep into the profits of theaters, especially vaudeville theaters, the world over, simply because it offers better value for the admission price. And it has come to stay. It only remains for us to better its general conditions. Picture theaters should be better aired than they are for the most part, and should be kept cleaner. The proprietors should be obliged to exercise discrimination in their employment of attendants, and the attendants should be obliged to maintain conditions favorable to public morals. Inspection by the police should be a part of the latter's duty. Censorship of the films with a view to the elimination of indelicacy has already been effective in New York City for some months, and with good results.

The Featherweight touch lessens the work and the cost, per folio

A typewriter which needs heavy operating to make impressions uses the operator's strength to make up for its lack of mechanical perfection. It is a drag on the operator's energy and time. All this is overcome in

Monarch Light Touch

The Monarch requires only a feathery touch to get a clear, legible, regular impression. The exclusive Monarch mechanism completes the impulse. Mechanical accuracy accomplishes faultlessly in the Monarch what human force does imperfectly in others.

BIG per cent. saved on light bill in addition to a flickerless picture. Improved star and cam that makes pictures overlap one another at the aperture.

A Special process of getting the arcs absolutely true with one another.
B Hardened and ground pin located with an accurate jig after cam band is ground to size.
C Is a hardened interchangeable cam band, tempered, then pressed into recess, afterwards being ground dead true. This is a mechanical stunt, as all manufacturers have been handicapped on hardening the complete cam.

THE LIFE OF MOSES

When this standard five-reel subject was issued by the Vitagraph Company a little over a year ago, we printed in the MOVING PICTURE WORLD a descriptive reading for each reel, prepared by the Rev. Madison C. Peters. The demand for copies of the WORLD containing these readings have exhausted our supply, so we have reprinted them in pamphlet form.

This important Biblical series of pictures should never be presented without a lecture, and, to make this possible, we will supply the exhibitor with the complete set at the nominal price of Ten Cents, postage paid.

THE THANHOUSER WO-A-WEEK

RELEASED TUESDAY, MAY 16

A Patriotic Masterpiece

The Colonel and the King is a pretty promoter of patriotism and the "Thanhouser Twist." The patriotism is apparent right through the last half of the reel and the twist, of course, at the end. You don't get much patriotism at the beginning, because the story begins in a foreign land and no Americans are visible. It swings from the royal palace at Saxonia to a dingy Continental shipping port, thence to Ellis Island in the Land of Liberty and next to a fort out West. It takes you half round the world in fifteen minutes.

No. 211. Code Word, Coling.

Getting 2 Thanhousers a Week?

RELEASED FRIDAY, MAY 19

LADY CLARE

After The Poem

BY ALFRED TENNYTON

The story this famous poem tells is familiar to all, and "It Pays To Be Frank," which in a gist is the moral conveyed, is so essentially wholesome and uplifting that it may well be honored with filming. The lines

"'I am a beggar born,' she said
'And not the Lady Clare.'"

have become historical for the very air of simple frankness that runs through them, and the film-story MUST be a success with so pleasing a motif.

No. 212. Code Word, Clare.

THE LIFE OF MOSES

When this standard five-reel subject was issued by the Vitagraph Company a little over a year ago, we printed in the MOVING PICTURE WORLD a descriptive reading for each reel, prepared by the Rev. Madison C. Peters. The demand for copies of the WORLD containing these readings have exhausted our supply, so we have reprinted them in pamphlet form.

This important Biblical series of pictures should never be presented without a lecture, and, to make this possible, we will supply the exhibitor with the complete set at the nominal price of Ten Cents, postage paid.

Casting the Horoscope.

"There is no doubt about t, the American films are eyond comparison with any thers now on the market. They are varied and clear, nd the companies go to normous expense and rouble to dress the actors or the parts and to enact heir stories with the proper ackground of scenery and roperties." — Montague A. yke.

"When the industry is as free in America as it is abroad, then it will advance by leaps and bounds, producing pictures suitable for the time and age . . . Not one of them (the Patents Company's licensees) is in a position to give the industry educational or elevating film stories . . . Some of the Independents are as bad, some worse." — Alfred H. Saunders.

The above two quotations are so antithetical that if either one comes near being the truth the other shows the densest ignorance on the part of the writer or is a wilful perversion of facts. The former is so flattering to the American manufacturers that it might have been made by one of themselves, whereas it was uttered by an Englishman who has large exhibiting interests in the British Isles. The latter and un-American sentiment is quoted from the editorial in a so-called trade paper which exists on the charity of the very manufacturers that it would discredit.

Montague A. Pyke is the managing director of the largest company operating a string of moving picture theatres in Great Britain, which country did not have one strictly moving picture theatre five years ago. Now England is credited with 2,000 and London, alone, with over 300. Beginning three years ago, the boom is spreading and the London newspapers are now devoting large space to the cinematograph. It is natural that London journalists, in seeking for reliable information, should interview such a man as Montague A. Pyke, whose unerring judgment is shown in the success of the circuit of theatres that is earning huge dividends for the company of which he is director. The article from which we quote says that new houses are being constructed as quickly as the methods of English builders will permit. Mr. Pyke's company already runs fifteen of the most successful houses in London and plans are on foot to increase this number to fifty.

"What," says our authority, "is the cause of this remarkable change in attitude on the part of the English public and in the prosperity of the moving picture theatres? In the opinion of those best qualified to say, it is due to American films. Moving picture shows in England, as in the United States, are absolutely dependent on the American films, and were the prominent companies in the United States to stop manufacturing or to cut off their supply for the time being the fortunes of the cinematograph theatres would drop with a suddenness that would give heart failure to their many backers."

It is a safe deduction that the director of a company controlling so many theatres keeps close tab on the films which are in most popular demand. That the American films are popular over the water we know because the European demand has long since more than doubled the output of many of the American manufacturers. Whether Mr. Pyke is entirely justified in crediting the boom in Great Britain to the superiority of the American product, it is a peculiar coincidence that this boom began at or about the time that the American manufacturers established London agencies. Previous to that time there was no lack of English film manufacturers, although there was a scarcity or absence of the strictly speaking cinematograph show.

In justice to the European manufacturers, we must admit that they are, with a few exceptions, almost entirely shut out from the American market. Exclusion from this profitable field is no doubt one reason why they do not or can not put more money into their productions, but this does not alter the fact that the American product entered the European market and made a name for itself at a time when the International, the Film Import and Trading Company and other concerns were endeavoring to force a demand for the European product in this country. Public opinion, again, has been the controlling factor.

Coming back to the quotations which parallel Mr. Pyke's voluntary admissions, they are taken from an editorial in a paper which professes to exploit American film trade interests. Are they worthy of any reply? Only in so far as they are calculated to mislead the unwary or those who are unacquainted with their author. It is unfortunate that this "Old Man of the Sea" cannot assimilate American ideas. It is unfortunate for himself and for those with whom he is thrown in contact that he is a persistent conscious or unconscious perverter of facts. His many horoscopes of "the future of the moving picture" have been so hopelessly miscalculated that no one takes him seriously—except himself. Listen to this:

"Who invented moving pictures? This is a question we are often asked. Our reply has invariably been, No one can either legally or morally lay claim as the inventor."

This in spite of the fact that only a few months ago he heralded W. Friese-Greene as the inventor and hoodwinked the supporters of his paper out of a considerable sum of money to import the real article. But out of charity we will draw the veil over the attendant circumstances.

Without any realization of what the effect would be, he clamors for the open market and says: "Cinematography should be as free as any other trade." Among the trades he specifies is bricklaying, oblivious of the fact that bricklayers have the strongest kind of a union and brickmakers have a strong business organization to safeguard their business. But is it flattering for those who look upon cinematography as one of the fine arts to be classed with bricklayers and tailors?

In our own columns we have, in the past, dispassionately discussed the pros and cons of the open market. The only unanswerable argument we found in its favor was in its application to the consumer and not to the manufacturer. If all exchanges were at liberty to buy wherever they pleased and if the present or a uniform selling price could be maintained, certain manufacturers would soon double their sales while others would go to the wall. In this way merit would receive its reward, public opinion would be the inexorable censor and qualitative competition would work out the survival of the fittest. Who will not agree with us that this would be an ideal condition? Who will solve the problem of maintaining a fixed price, without which such a condition would be worse than the present? But a free and open market in the film manufacturing field, with its attendane price-cutting and lowering of quality! Save us from such a catastrophe!

Again, with Rip Van Winkle perspicacity, our oracle asks: "Has any member of the licensees of the Patents Company turned out an educational film?" Indeed they have and the supply has hitherto been in excess of the demand. Surely he is not ignorant of the fact that at least one Patents Company licensee expended a large sum of money in the compilation of a catalogue of educational films and endeavored to force a market in the educational field. That work has borne fruit. The demand for educational films is increasing and manufacturers, both licensed and independent, are preparing to compete for the business. Many of them have already a supply of negatives of educational subjects on hand to be released when the proper time comes. And what is more, before the close of another year we will see established an educational film bureau in New York City with distributing branches in other populous centers. In the evolution of the business it was bound to come and to ensure its permanency and success it must not be affiliated with the amusement field. But it is not necessary that "before all this can dawn, the people of 'nickelodia' must demand justice and petition Congress to enquire into the methods of the M. P. P. Co."

The Ethics of the Poster.

Displaying a certain kind of poster is like waving a red flag at a bull if there are any crime suppressors knocking about. To all intents and purposes a poster is considered to be an index of something that is being or is to be exhibited. It is not to be expected that the enemies of the picture theatre spend any great amount of their time inside of an institution they are supposed to hate. The truth of the matter, as everybody knows, is that the majority of them have never been inside of a picture house. Having received their gospel from hearsay, untrustworthy newspaper reports, exaggerated pulpit utterances and hoodwinked magistrates, it is not unreasonable to suppose that a twentieth century apostle, in passing one of the picture houses that displays crime posters, should pass on his way with morbid mutterings about "sinks of iniquity" upon his lips.

From his point of view everything is obvious. He has read bitter indictments of the moving picture evil and here before his eyes, as he passes the theatre, is voluntary proof that what he has read is true. He sees the poster of a murder and robbery. He has read of this very thing, and now he sees for himself, because the manager admits it; not only admits it, but emblazons the fact in lurid lithography that within these portals, "performance now going on," there will be exhibited a murder and robbery for the delectation of blood-thirsty shoppers, who have time to witness it, in exchange for the small sum of five cents. Like many in the passing throng, he has no time to stop and see it. If he had the time to spare, it is not probable that he would go in to see it. He has already been too much horrified by the reports of depravity to do that, so he passes on his way, with the morbid mutterings, and without a thought that the posters he has seen are not a truthful index of what is to be seen inside.

This little every-day occurrence brings us directly to the ethics of the poster. There are no intricacies to the ethics of the poster. They can be summed up in the one word, "Truth." This may seem a broad statement to many who have long since conceived the idea that a poster must be nine parts fiction to one of truth in order to be a successful poster. Certain people are fond of prating that moth-eaten phrase that "the American people like to be humbugged," alleged to have been said by P. T. Barnum. There are two things quite certain about that. First, the American people do not like to be humbugged, and secondly, P. T. Barnum never said any such thing, unless he said it in his dotage when his book was written (by somebody else). We must give him credit for having a small amount of brains at least. No man ever lived who gave the people a bigger run for their fifty cents than P. T. Barnum. It is true that he sometimes advertised and exhibited fakes. That was long, long ago, but he made up for it by giving plenty of the real thing. Thirty-five years ago the Barnum show passed into the control of James A. Bailey, and Mr. Barnum did very little faking after that. Mr. Bailey began where Barnum left off, and those who are now trying to emulate that alleged statement of Barnum's, are about thirty years behind the times.

The poster in the form we now know it originated with the American circus. It was considered the proper thing in the early days to exaggerate wherever possible.

The circus was a transient affair, and therefore it seemed such a simple matter to advertise anything within the bounds of imagination without the slightest intention of fulfilling any promise. "Here today and gone tomorrow," was the slogan. Perhaps this slogan has some connection with the now extinct "Hey Rube," which was the cry for battle between the townspeople and the circus men. The "Hey Rube" began to be a thing of the past when James A. Bailey took charge of the Barnum show. He saw the real cause of the "Hey Rube," which was nothing else than the dissatisfaction of the people who had come to the show expecting to see certain advertised performances that were not given. He noticed in every town that the younger men, disgruntled over being faked, were eager to pick a fight, which they usually did. Many are the truthful tales of men buried in ring banks. The circus crews were like a well-trained football squad. They generally won their battles against the leaderless mob, but at a price. There was an odium against the circus that lingers faintly to this day.

Bailey was the man to discover that faking doesn't pay, even in transient show business. Today there is scarcely a circus that would think of advertising what it does not have. When a featured act leaves the show, its posters disappear. There may be a few very small circuses that do not show what they advertise, but they are not worth considering. Look among the leaders. The Ringling Brothers would no more think of advertising something they do not have than a local department store would think of advertising lisle-thread stockings as silk. It was wrongly supposed, in the days gone by, that when the circus came back to town a year or two later, its faking would be forgotten, but wise showmen came to find out that it was not forgotten, even after four or five years. Some circuses never dared to go back; not under the same name, but it has been discovered that a good name is worth having, even in circus business. The public thanks and the public knows. It brings to mind that saying of Lincoln's about "fooling all of the people some of the time," etc., which contains more wisdom than that one of Barnum's, if he ever said it. One is diametrically opposed to the other. Now which is right?

In the light of these facts, then, what is the status of the moving picture man who thinks the people like to be humbugged? To us it appears that he is following the alleged principles of a man who has been dead for twenty years. There are many of them. Ten minutes' walk to the south of this office are a couple of shining examples of that type. They evidently figure that there are several thousands passing there each day who will be gone tomorrow, never to return. In one way they are right, for they will never return to their theatres, but it is a fallacy that is exploded at Keith's just up the way. There are many annual out-of-town customers at Keith's. He has a reputation; the others have not, nor will they ever have so long as they hang up their lurid, misleading posters of murder in the first degree, bank robberies, stage hold-ups, etc., that are never shown inside. No doubt it is their faking methods that makes these showmen content to get the transient nickel while every other show on the street is getting a dime by legitimate means, and without any bother. The lying showman is a discredit to the business as a whole. He is fooling himself and not the public. Let him take an example from the successful circus man. Where once his only credit was C. O. D. every time, today it is as good as gold. He is the pioneer of the poster and he knows that the ethics of the poster is TRUTH.

Three-fourths of the people smile quietly when they enjoy a picture; the other fourth laugh uproariously; some managers and manufacturers seem to cater to that other fourth.

Ventilation.

This will not be a technical article. Neither will it be scientific nor constructive nor mathematical. However, it may be psychological, if it is not already too late. It is particularly intended as a warning.

The fecundity of reformers and moving picture agitators is almost sublime in its infinite variety. It is commonly said that lightning never strikes twice in the same place. We of the moving picture fraternity have passed through many storms, and our garments are bespattered with the mud of professional mud-slingers from the reform camp. We have all been struck by lightning so many times that our garments are tattered as well as smeared. But within the heart beats strong; the cause goes steadily onward, and moving picture men, though their feet may be trudging in the quagmire of destructive criticism, are able to see the sunshine on the horizon before them. But the end is not yet.

Another storm cloud looms in the sky; this time it is the bugaboo of ventilation. Our friends, the enemy, for some years have personally conducted us over the bumps. In its formative stage, the moving picture business went through the throes of child legislation, the effects of which still linger. That period might be called the scarlet-fever stage of the infant industry. Later on, the growing infant had its measels in the form of drastic fire legislation. Then came the high license mumps, and after that came the censorship croup, which in its turn gave way to the chicken-pox of swearing in the films. The infant industry has also passed through its whooping cough in agitation against darkened theatres. It has had its teething ever since they began to rail about crime pictures. It went through a period of sore eyes with all the talk about flickering films and so on. But we find that there are not enough childrens' diseases to complete a full similie, and we are at a loss for a child's disease with which to compare the coming crusade against ventilation, or lack of it, as the case may be.

Already reports are coming to us from divergent sources that the ventilation campaign is on. Having attended to the public's eyes and ears and bodies and minds and morals, the self-constituted guardians are going to attend to their noses. After that, we are wondering where next the lightning will strike. But for the present, suffice it to say to exhibitors everywhere that the ventilation crusade will be the next flea to bite them.

There are a lot of smells in the world, and most of these have a meaning all their own. If we were in a darkened room, we could tell that certain persons were present by instinct. In a sense this agitation about ventilation is a direct insult to the audience itself, but that is a small matter when their welfare is at stake. We are glad that we are not bloodhounds or any other animal having such a keen sense of scent, for in such a case we fear that life would be a very unpleasant affair.

Agitation along the lines of ventilation partakes of the same nature as the endeavor to purify the minds of the lower classes by legislation. For instance: It is well known to anyone, who is not a bigot, that a moving picture show in a tough neighborhood will be tough, no matter if the place be conducted by an angel and nothing but views of Heaven are shown. The same applies in the matter of ventilation. There are some theatres that need ventilation, and need it badly, but they need it more after the audience has gone than before it came in. Some of them ought to be fumigated after every show.

During the winter just gone by we visited the lower east side picture houses. One theatre we visited is located in Hester Street. We took notice at that time of the ventilating arrangement, as the subject of ventilation was uppermost in our minds all the time we were present. There were a number of fans, both buzz-fans and exhaust-fans, all hard at work, and a window wide open near the back. But even this was entirely inadequate. No doubt the place would have smelled even if the roof had been taken off. The recollection of it is still so vivid that we would shrink from the idea of follinwg that same crowd in another steamer on a trip to Coney Island, if the wind were blowing our way.

Moving picture ventilation depends upon the location of the theatre. It is easy enough to keep a house sweet and clean and purify the air, if the patrons are themselves sweet and clean. But we submit to the agitators: How is it possible to keep the air pure in an east side picture house without compelling each patron to take a bath upon entering, while his clothes are being fumigated? Perhaps they can pass a law to that effect, but we would like to have a moving picture of anyone attempting to enforce that law.

There is a certain odor from wet wool that can always be smelled in any theatre on a rainy day. This is due to the animal nature of the garments people wear, and is unpreventable, no matter to whom the garment belongs, if the garment be wet. The smell of several hundred damp woolen garments is more than noticeable, it is disagreeable. But it cannot be prevented in the best ventilated theatre in the world. The matter of ventilation has been studied by moving picture men long before now. Every exhibitor worthy of the name, it is safe to say, has spent much time and thought upon the subject. All that they can do has been done; therefore impending legislation concerning ventilation will have no terrors for managers of theatres in respectible residential sections. The agitation is merely another phase of the indefatigable crusaders' work. The Hogan's Alley Theatre will never be perfectly ventilated until the patrons themselves are fumigated. The vast amount of good in the moving picture business will be again discredited by the Poverty Row picture house which has already played such a tremendous part in retarding the general approval of the moving picture.

Watch Selig.

The outstanding event of our sojourn in Chicago was a visit to the plant of the Selig Polyscope Company. During the past year the remark has often been made, "Selig is falling down" or "The Selig films are not as good as they were." This was very true, and there was a reason. Not so very long ago the Selig film was regarded as a headliner. The demand for them increased so that greater facilities were needed. It was then that Mr. Selig acquired a tract of ground adjoining his plant and planned new buildings and improvements. A little over a year ago we visited the premises and the walls of the new buildings were about shoulder high. But work was at a standstill on account of a strike. Chicago is the hotbed of strikes and labor disagreements, and if it was not the masons, it was the plasterers, or the plumbers or the ironworkers—always something to hamper progress. Even now the construction work is incomplete, but a marvelous laboratory system is working. During the past year Selig films were muddy or otherwise lacking quality. Now there are in operation gigantic water and air filtering plants, with improved machinery, and some coming releases that we were permitted to see equalled in technical perfection the best produced in the world today. From now on watch the improvement in Selig films and give all credit to this concern for the difficulties they have encountered and surmounted.

Interesting Report.

Some weeks since, Raymond B. Fosdick, Commissioner of Accounts for Greater New York, made a report to Mayor Gaynor which is of considerable general interest. The commissioner has, at the mayor's suggestion, been conducting an investigation and "systematic study," as he puts it, of affairs pertaining to motion picture theaters.

The report, which is voluminous, when boiled down to its essentially interesting features, sets forth the following: (a) That no laws of particular consequence (other than Section 484 of the Penal Code, applying to admission of children under 16) have been passed with special reference to the construction, conduct or operation of motion picture theaters. (b) That neither theater managers nor city officials have any exact understanding of the rights, duties and obligations in the premises. That the officials are attempting to apply laws and ordinances enacted long before picture theaters came into existence. (c) That authority to regulate picture houses is distributed between seven different departments of the city government, and that this causes much overlapping, and even conflict of authority, breeding confusion. (d) That licenses for picture houses may be of two kinds, dependent not upon the seating capacity, but wholly upon the kind of performance. If pictures be coupled with vaudeville acts, a theater or concert license, costing $500 is required, same being revocable only by the Supreme Court. If, on the other hand, pictures only, accompanied by songs and recitations not rendered on a stage, are given, then a common show license may be granted by the mayor for a license fee of $25 per annum, same being revocable at the mayor's discretion.

It might be added that the police have claimed authority to prohibit even songs and piano playing under this license, though we do not know that any such arbitrary action has actually been taken.

(f) That study of the situation convinces the commissioner that abuses connected with motion picture shows are largely ascribable to

(1) The lack of definite laws and ordinances and uniform regulations in regard to the moving picture business.

(2) The lack of centrifugal control by the municipal authorities.

(3) The presence in the building code of a section which virtually restricts the moving picture business to small "store front" shows.

The commissioner makes certain recommendations at the end of his report that do not seem to be of much practical value. The report is, as a whole, however, excellent, and we regret lack of space in which to give publicity in its entirety. As a matter of fact, however, it contains absolutely nothing at all but what has been already set forth in these columns from time to time.

The commissioner rightly ascribes the preponderance of evil to two main things, viz.: the utter lack of any comprehensive law, or laws, designed to deal with motion picture theaters, and the evil effect of the two classes of license which in effect confines moving picture shows to houses of the "store room" type, unless one can pay $500 per year license and comply with a set of requirements designed for, and applying to the largest theaters in New York City.

The first named condition has bred confusion. As the situation is today there is not a single exhibitor in all New York who can say with confidence "I comply with the law." Why? For the simple reason that in all New York not one single exhibitor knows what the law is! Again, why? Because but few points are covered by law at all, the rest being regulated according to "rules" formulated by various departments, or left entirely to the discretion of department heads and, even worse, to the individual whim of sub-inspectors.

That such conditions are an outrage cannot be denied. Time, time and again has redress been sought, but in vain. Now, however, it seems there is a chance to secure real action. The mayor has appointed a committee of five members to assist the Board of Aldermen in the task of drafting ordinances designed to govern motion picture houses as such. This is good—maybe.

It is excellent, provided the committee and lawmakers proceed sensibly, handling the matter along proper and sane lines. To do this it will be absolutely imperative that practical motion picture men be called into consultation. It is not to be supposed that any committee, or any set of aldermen not thoroughly conversant with all phases of the photo-play exhibition business can devise laws which will be of the best possible design, unless they confer with those thoroughly conversant with all details of the business. An attempt to formulate laws without such advice as is here suggested would, in all probability, result in more or less injustice and utterly needless hardship for years to come.

The commissioner has "started something"; it is now up to New York City exhibitors to see to it that the matter proceeds along right and proper lines.

In a recent interview with the President of the American Film Manufacturing Company he described to us a new non-infringing camera of which he has secured the patent. At the American plant we were shown prints from several negatives presumably made with this camera, steady on the screen and of excellent photographic quality. The camera is now being tried out by other independent manufacturers, and so far the reports are very satisfactory.

Speaking of quality, the photography of the American is uniformly excellent; also the stagecraft. With a little more care in the selection and preparation of the stories, the work of this company should soon reach the top notch of popularity.

Among the coming feature films that we have seen is one entitled "Back to the Primitive." For variety of scenery and novelty of incident it is beyond comparison. We are aware that Selig has had photographers and producers in foreign countries for some time, and if "Back to the Primitive" was not made in the wilds of Africa, it has all the signs of it. A vessel conveying an English lady to her brother in Africa is wrecked. With two other survivors she is cast on the African coast. Living in a hut she pets and rears two young leopards who afterwards save her life by killing a lion which is seen prowling around the hut. Annoyed by the attentions of a Boer farmer she flees and is lost in the forest; here she is found by an elephant to which she had been kind and he picks her up and carries her to safety. The final rescue by a searching party is the climax of realism in moving picture stagecraft. In fact the whole film surpasses in thrilling incident and scenic grandeur anything yet produced. Exchanges will make no mistake in doubling their standing orders on this film, and exhibitors, see that you all get it, and book it not by the day, but by the week if you can.

By Robert Grau.

The photo-play has become an established feature. One by one the film companies have resorted to this most practical of their assets, until the number who have not organized stock companies and competent stage directors are decidedly in the minority, and even this latter class are likely to capitulate before the close of the present year. The reason for this is apparent enough. The theater naturally has supplied a mass of matter for the cinematographic art, and the film projectors have been quick to realize that they can draw on the legitimate stage for an abundance of material and it will take many generations before they can exhaust their opportunities in this respect, in fact the modern stage is not as prolific, in what it offers for reproduction on the screen, as are the discarded works from Shakespeare's day back to the period of Sophocles and Homer, "the photo-play" lends itself more readily to the historic spectacles of olden times than it does to the stage recitals of the 20th century, and here lies the very stability and longevity of cinematography.

The stock companies engaged abroad by the film companies are organized in an almost colossal way, the equipment being along the most extravagant lines, and to me it is amazing the way some of the most artistic and exalted members of these companies, drafted from the first theaters of Europe, are content to acquiesce to the necessity for outdoor performance in order that they may better qualify for that which they undertake to portray. The spectacle of Madame Desclauzas, of the Palais Royal, on horseback, engaged in an altercation with a band of mountebanks, during which she is seemingly violently handled, is surely a picturesque one, but not more so than the realistic portrayal by Mounet-Sully, the greatest actor on the French stage, of a role in which he is forced to indulge in outdoor acrobatics. Evidently the French film makers can offer inducements tempting enough to justify the leading societaire of the Comédie Francaise to throw to the winds all traditions of dramatic art, and this leads one to become imaginative as to the day when perhaps in this country Maude Adams will be induced to pose for a photo-play wherein she will indulge in such outdoor scenes as a play like "Joan of Arc" permits of, but which may not be portrayed on the stage of a theater.

Only in the last few weeks have the faces of the players in these American photo-plays been familiar to me, and then only in a very few instances. The Edison Company has so very large a roster engaged, that it would be surprising if all were strangers to one who has been active in the field of the theater for forty years, but it is pleasant to be able to state that these faces that were recognizable represented some of the best known players of the American stage. In all, I found in one reel five standard professionals taking part, three sterling actors, and two actresses of reputation, whose services have always been in demand.

The photo-play is evolving from its infancy and its growth will be accompanied by a vast improvement in the quality of the scenarios as well as those who will interpret them. Already we find that the film makers are not only advertising their principal players by the lithographs and photographs displayed in lobbies, but also on the screen, and this is as it should be, for in this way the players are provided with an incentive for their greatest endeavor, and the goal of each will be to become a "star" and a favorite with the audiences.

The development along these lines will be rapid and vigorous as the better class of players become identified with cinematography, and as their names become popular in the newer field, an effort will be made to present the most attractive casts, and here we have the greatest incentive for progressiveness that can readily be conceived of, for with the advent of the best known players will come scenarios, practical and expanded, from the world's greatest playwrights. The two forces combined, must eventually result in arriving at a state of perfection in the offerings, which will eliminate to a great extent the very primitive methods now in vogue in indulging in "explanations" on the screen, also in transcribing on the screen letters and telegrams for the purpose of clarifying the spectator's mind, but which is inconcrete in its effect, and disillusionizing.

I am absolutely sure that with the greatest players and playwrights available to the enterprising and liberal film companies, we will within two years see a photo-play where the clarity of the recital is not hampered by these interruptions and explanations. Even now a really good picture well operated, with clear effect, can convey any amount of dialogue to the audience by movement of lips. I have watched this very important matter very closely and I feel justified, in my desire to see the art of cinematography reach the greatest heights, to hope that others more scientific than myself will grasp the great importance of the subject and better supply the remedy, but we are now in the most vital period of the progressive stage, the period wherein the talent and genius of the world is being attracted toward a tremendously prosperous and constantly uplifting line of histrionic endeavor.

Melodrama.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

The sensational play now called "Melodrama" has a place in our hearts whether we care to acknowledge it or not. I confess that I like it when it is not underdone, but then I am somewhere half-way between the holy mountain of high criticism and the abyss of low taste. I can enjoy grand opera or Coney Island according to circumstances; in either case a pretty girl with a sweet smile helps along; the main question at any place of entertainment is, "Do we like it or do we feel as though we were not getting our money's worth?"

Melodrama was originally what the name implies—a dramatic composition in which music was used; it was the Italian name for grand opera. The Germans employed the term for plays in which instrumental music was used to heighten the thrill. The French first made use of the term as it is now understood for sensational and romantic plays to chills-and-fever music. Then the English added to the regular villain—the man who is bad without motive or provocation,—a second villain with redeeming qualities, the kind that says:

"I'll lie for you, Sir Desmond; I'll steal for you; I'll fight for you, but damn me if I will kill that innocent little girl for you!"

The villain, however, is the chief factor. While he lives interest is kept going by his being "foiled again"; but when he dies the play is over.

Next in order of importance is the persecuted heroine. She must be shamefully treated and constantly exposed to death in spite of her blameless character. Over and over again, with streaming eyes and quivering lips she tries to establish her in-no-cence. In "Nellie, the Beautiful Cloak Model" she faces sure death exactly seventeen times from curtain to curtain. At last, driven to desperation, she exclaims:

"Why do I not die?"

That is certainly an appropriate question to ask after the villain has tied her to the buzz-saw, thrown her overboard in mid-ocean, fed her to the stone-crusher and dropped her off the Brooklyn Bridge; quite as natural as his own query:

"Why do you fear me, Nellie?"

"Nellie, the Beautiful Cloak Model" is a problem play.

We miss these interesting questions when the melodrama is shown on the screen and, far, far worse, we miss that absolute essential to success, appropriate music.

With the "melo" disjointed from the "drama" the thriller fails to thrill.

One hard kind that will stand for almost any sort of musical accompaniment is "Red-Handed Ike of Bloody Run." It goes like this:

Scene I—Bloody Run bar. The Cattle King strikes Red with his whip. Red swears to be avenged. Cowboys hear the oath.

Scene II—On the plaza, Charlotta is dancing while Pedro plays the guitar. They quarrel. Pedro about to strike Carlotta. Red springs with a tiger-like bound upon the Mexican. In the struggle Pedro tears off Red's neck kerchief, but Red hurls him to the ground and disappears with Carlotta. Pedro, with Red's kerchief in hand, swears to be avenged.

Scene III—Exterior of Cattle King's ranch. Pedro and his bandit steal horses and ride away. Before he goes, he drops Red's kerchief on the ground.

Scene IV—Road. Pedro and bandits, on stolen horses, mask. Stage coach appears. Hold-up. Violet Saint Clair steps forth from coach. Pedro smitten. He holds her for ransom. Coach drives on.

Scene V—Exterior of Cattle King's ranch. King discovers loss of horses and Red's kerchief. He goes to:

Scene VI—Sheriff's office. Stage drives up. Sheriff roused by robbery and abduction, summons cowboy deputies. King appears, describes theft of horses and shows Red's kerchief. Sheriff and cowboys dash off to:

Scene VII—Red's shack. He is on horse. He notes approach of sheriff and rides away, fearing arrest for attacking Pedro.

Scenes VIII, IX and X—Sheriff and cowboys chase Red.

Scene XI—Mountain gorge. Pedro and bandits with captive, Violet Saint Claire. She rejects his advances. He tortures her. Red dashes in on scene and dismounts. Terrific hand-to-hand fight with Pedro, bandits closing upon Red, when sheriff and cowboys arrive. Pitched battle. Pedro killed and Red captured.

Sub-title, "He Is Innocent!"

Scene XII—Same as Scene XI. Sheriff and cowboys proceed to hang Red on the spot as a horsethief. Violet Saint Claire recognized by the Cattle King, as his long-lost daughter points to Pedro as the villain. Red is allowed to go, but Violet will not have it so. The brave fellow is her possession for life.

Scene XIII—Cattle King's parlor. Cattle King begs Red's pardon and gives him Violet's hand. Lovers embrace.

Any kind of music from "That Yiddisher Rag" to Gounod's "Ave Maria" will do for this kind of melodrama. The principal trouble with pistol dramas is a growing disinclination on the part of censors to give their approval, but if vice is vanquished and virtue victorious, why should they care? Let the villain get what he deserves. I do not care for plays like "why they acted as they did while they might have done differently."

Give us a thrill, stir our blood, but be careful about the way you do it. The moment it is underdone or overdue, we can not stomach it at all. It is not necessary to have the heroine marry a hero while his neck is still red with marks of the hangman's rope. Give him a chance to wash up. Cut out the stage fight where the hero runs a sword or a knife under the villain's arm, and give us a genuine struggle between two strong men using each other to knock the furniture to pieces. That is the stuff that goes.

There is a chance for high melodrama, where good and evil are in conflict, with poignant scenes and situations of stress. The picture of strife may be made to impress us powerfully, but the danger of incongruity is always present; it is such a short step from the tragic to the comic. I should say that it would be best to introduce a central figure with great care, a man who is struggling with courage and vigor against adverse circumstances, and carry him through incidents calculated to test his best qualities to the utmost. A melodrama with a real hero would go with all classes, only as I have remarked in these columns, "We must display the man by exhibiting his passions before his actions are accountable." "The essence of interest lies not in the situation, but in what it brings out in those engaged in solving it."

Swelling the Box Office Receipts.

Covering the Entertainment Features of a Theater—Film Selection, Clearness and Tempo of Projection, Orchestral and Vocal Music, and Vaudeville.

By George Rockhill Craw.

(Second Article.)

While, as pointed out last week, the welfare and comfort of the audiences are important elements in the building of the box office business of a theater, still the most scrupulous regard for these two important essentials will not make a theater popular unless it furnishes a first-class entertainment.

Indeed, the program's power to please is the most direct factor in the popularity of a playhouse, although welfare and comfort facilities are no less important because of their more indirect bearing.

But, with the audience, "the play's the thing." If it is good, they come again and tell others of its merit. If it is poor, they stay away, and go to the rival house. Their "knockings" are quickly felt in the box office of the theater scorned, for there is nothing so sensitive as the ticket tape.

Selecting Films.

The selection of films is one of the most important duties in the conduct of a theater. The time has not yet come when you can tie to a dozen or more playwrights of whom you are confident that anything they may write will be good. The producers, with one or two exceptions, have not even allowed you to know the names of the playwrights whose comedies and dramas you are offering to your audiences. If they did permit you to know, you would soon begin to call for films by certain authors whose work you and your audiences liked best. This would result in a demand for the scenarios of the most capable photo-play dramatists.

For your own guidance in selecting your films, Mr. Theater Owner, you should demand to know the names of the authors of the photo-plays you use. It is not enough to know that a film is the work of a certain producer. The work of any producer varies, being governed largely by the quality of the scenario, and the producer's haste to make a release.

An author's work never varies, if he is a true artist. He has standards of quality that are unaffected by a large investment of capital upon which returns must be paid. Reputation for perfect work is more to him than money, and he has no expensive establishment to keep up, willy nilly, as have the producers. Furthermore, such an artist will sell his drama only to such producers as give them a faithful production, and when you buy a film with his name attached to it as the author, you will know that it is "right."

In their own interest, theater owners should demand the author's name on every film ordered. You have a right to the information. If you should gain this point, it will begin a new era in the artistic development of the photo-play. It will mean better comedies and dramas for you all, which, of course, means increased box office receipts.

Guarding Against Rivalry and Loss.

"Rough house" films that will please the audience of a theater located in a neighborhood made up of the laboring classes will not gain favor in a house situated in a high-grade residential district, but it is surprising how well the films that please in the exclusive neighborhood are received by the lower classes. I refer to high-class subjects, such as classic romantic dramas, travel subjects, etc. Theater owners will do well to cultivate the taste of their audiences by gradually increasing the number of high-class film subjects, thus cutting down the demand for slap-stick comedy and cheap melodrama.

Besides the ethical side of cultivating the taste of the people, there is a box-office reason for so doing. Suppose a theater, located in a neighborhood of the "hoi-polloi," has a very profitable business. We will say it runs the slap-stick comedy and the cheap melodrama. Because there is no other playhouse in the neighborhood, the audience, which is easily entertained, accepts the show and is faithful in its patronage.

The management, content to let well enough alone, makes no effort to ascertain whether higher-class films would not please better. All goes well until another theater opens as a rival. Its owner, believing the neighborhood would appreciate high-class film subjects, puts on a choice program. Its business grows, but the other theater holds its own with its lower quality of films. It is evident the people of the neighborhood are attending both shows—doubling the amount of money they formerly spent for moving pictures.

But gradually the lower grade begins to lose business, and then, suddenly, it realizes that its former prestige is gone, that it has lost its patronage to the higher grade house, and as its managers are probably not resourceful, they sell out, knowing that it is the most difficult and expensive thing in the world to regain the patronage of a house that has "gone dead."

Box Office Insurance.

The taste of an audience improves as the days go by. If the losing theater's management had itself cultivated this taste by running the better class films occasionally, trying them out on its audience, and ascertaining the effect, it would have built up the quality of its own show and the taste of its audience, leaving no demand for another theater, and holding its own in the face of any competitive house that might have been established in its neighborhood.

Indeed, proper film selection amounts almost to box office insurance. It is the best protection against competition and loss.

One bright theater owner, who keeps a watchful finger ever upon the pulse of his audience, has slips of paper passed about, once each week, before the beginning of the program. He announces that it is his desire to show the kind of films that his audience likes best, therefore he has had the slips passed around so that the members of the audiences may write down the films they like best, and the ones they dislike, giving their reasons briefly.

As the audience passes out the slips of paper are dropped into boxes held by the ushers. The owner then tabulates the result which shows the most popular item of the performance, the next popular and the least popular. At the end of a month, he has a pretty accurate knowledge of the class of films his audience likes best, and is able to please all his patrons in the selection of his films. Here are the contents of some of the slips that contained comments:

"Can't you give us more pictures like the 'Beautiful Wye Valley'? The scenery was grand and the picture very instructive."

"I liked the funny detective best. Papa liked it because he is a policeman."

"'The Golden Sickle.'—The story, acting and scenery were fine. Can you get any more Druid plays?"

"We like 'Selling Old Master' best, because there was so much trouble and it ended so happily."

"Hank and Lank got my goat. They have Mutt and Jeff beat. Pass us some more of them."

"I liked and didn't like 'The Little Shepherdess.' The author ought not to have married her to Giovanni. The ending was too muddled, and the knife fight was bad for my children to see."

Crime Affects Box Office Receipts.

There can be no doubt of the fact that crime in the films is a serious factor in the box office receipts.

If the theater cuts out all films that contain crimes, it losses business because of a lifeless and usually uninteresting program. If it runs films in which crimes are shown and is not careful to discriminate between those that suggest, vitiate and shock, and that do not, then also it loses patronage.

The safest plan to follow before choosing a film with a crime is to see that the methods and motives and scene of the crime are those of a different sphere of life from that of your audience. The end of the play should show that the crime's perpetrator has come to punishment or retribution for his deed.

This may not meet the approval of the "realistic" school, but as an affair of the box office it is good policy. My excuse, if one be needed, is that this is a box office article.

Projection an Important Factor.

Little need be said about the necessity for clearness and steadiness of projection. This element is of course as important a stone as any of the other blocks that are necessary in the supporting arch of a theater's success. In fact, everything done to build up a business is thrown away if the projection is poor. This fact is so generally recognized that the best photo-play trade paper has a popular department is given up to experiences, suggestions, drawings, and inventions in order to develop the best methods of projection possible.

Ambitious managers should require proper tempo in the showing of the films, and should carefully watch the work of their operators to see that the movements of the actors are as natural as possible. Of course I do not refer to comedy pictures that require accelerated speed to enhance the ludicrous effect. There is, however, a very grave error in tempo—one that is given little thought or improvement by the owners and managers. It is the time given to captions. These captions are necessary to an understanding of the film story by the audience. If enough time is not given to the captions, so that they may be intelligently read by the audience, the effect of a good film is lost and the audience is dissatisfied. Such dissatisfaction has a bad effect on box office receipts, and must be eliminated by a proper showing of captions.

The claim is made that the film manufacturers often do not allow enough of the film to the captions, which, it is said, actually counts in many cases for a too rapid showing of them. Again it is claimed that the exchanges reduce the length of the films, in many instances cutting the length of the captions. Theater owners should watch the films shown in their theaters. If the captions of a film are not given a long enough showing, the operator should be taken to task, and if it proves to be not his fault, a prompt complaint should be made to the exchange. If the exchange be not to blame, it will quickly take the matter up with the manufacturer, provided theater owners are insistent enough in their demands for properly prepared captions.

Another source of dissatisfaction to an audience is the missing title nuisance. Films should not be accepted from an exchange if their titles are missing. How would you like to attend a theater, Mr. Theater Owner, and not know the name of the play? It would not be very satisfactory to you, would it? So it is with your own audiences. If you insist upon every film having a title, it will help the box office.

Box Office "Pays the Piper."

And now we come to that much discussed subject, the music of the film theater. That it has a most important part in the building or killing of business is obvious. We are all familiar with that particular brand of cacophony, which Mr. Harrison has so aptly and humorously labeled "Jackass Music." Not only does the term suggest the bray of an ass, but its brains as well.

However, perhaps the term is a little harsh and undeserved by many of the embryo musicians to whom it is applied, as they are probably doing the best they can to earn the pittance that must reward such meagre talent. Rather, I should say, are the managers to blame for permitting such horrisonous orchestras to drive away trade, and if it came to a contest as to length of ears, it would be difficult to determine who should win, the dissonant musicians or their employers.

The orchestra is the voice of the picture. Rather have one good pianist than a full orchestra of poor players.

A beautiful picture accompanied by "Jackass Music" is as shocking as a lovely girl with a boiler maker's voice. There are many photo-play orchestras that are made up of fair musicians, but who lack the guiding mind to play a picture understandingly. All musicians have not the dramatic ability that must always guide in the proper selection of music for photo-plays, and the proper way to play it. A little coaching is all that is needed to greatly improve most of the film theater musicians of the country who really understand their instruments and their music, but who lack the knowledge of its proper application to photo-plays. Theater managers everywhere are giving more and more attention to their music, realizing that it is the box office that "pays the piper," and in more senses than one.

Illustrated Songs and Vaudeville.

The formative stage through which the film theaters are passing will probably make the illustrated song an institution and will eventually discard cheap vaudeville. The two forces working to accompish this are economy and taste. The half-baked "actors" who smirk and wiggle and clogprance about the stage are an expensive proposition, partly because of the number of them required for a vaudeville program, and partly because they do not build up a substantial, desirable business from the box office standpoint.

However, there are in every town and city many young people who sing well and who are not averse to earning money in refined film theaters. In fact, many who have marked talent are paying for a musical education in this way.

The tendency of the song slide manufacturers is toward improvement, both in the selection of the songs and in the illustration of them. The bright dashes of color in these slides furnish a pleasing contrast to the monochromatic picture plays, and the softer vocal music of the song relieves the orchestral stress of the accompaniments played to the motion pictures.

Coon shouting should be tabooed in theaters wishing to build up a refined, substantial patronage, but there is nothing more effective than a good, clean comic song, of which we have only too few to which colored slides have been set. Pretty colored slides and a sweet melody will carry through a sentimental song, the words of which may be absolutely inane in their "mushiness."

The same careful study and good judgment necessary in the selection of picture play films should be exercised in the choosing of illustrated songs, while every effort should be made to obtain singers with good voices and who have enough vocal technique to know how to use them. There are plenty of good singers to be had if the theater management will seek them intelligently and unceasingly, until it gains the proper quality for its vocal requirements. It should be remembered that the soloist is an important factor in building up box office receipts.

SPECIAL BY TELEGRAPH TO THE WORLD.

An important meeting of the Exhibitors' Association of Ohio, was held at Columbus on Tuesday. Delegates from other State Associations were present, and among the matters discussed was the National Convention. A committee was appointed to organize a National Convention of Exhibitors at Cleveland, Ohio, during the first week of August. Other matters of importance were discussed, a full report of which will be sent to The Moving Picture World by the secretary.

EBB-TIDE ENGLISH.

In an advertising talk in this paper the other day it was noted that a successful Western store paid a dollar to employees for every error they detected in its advertising. Maybe such a plan would somewhat improve the English on the bulletin boards of the moving picture shows in this town. Not once in ten times are they correctly expressed. The wrong spelling, the wrong word or the wrong construction appears. The writer has counted a dozen errors in a statement not four sentences long.—New York "Evening Mail."

Picture Personalities.

Hector J. McKinnon.

In this department it is the aim of the World to call attention to the work of such men as have really done something worth while in the field of animated photography, projection or any one of the branches of industry directly allied thereto.

It gives us pleasure to present the portrait of Mr. Hector J. McKinnon, chief electrician for Keith & Proctor, New York City.

When Mr. McKinnon was placed in direct charge of projection in the New York houses of the above company, projection, in all but one of them, the Harlem Opera House, ranged from poor to very poor. There were no operating rooms. Machines were located in the open at the balcony railing. This in many instances made such a short throw that the securing of sharp definition was well nigh an impossibility since a good sized picture was the rule.

Recently the writer made a tour of all the Keith & Proctor houses, viewing the performance without the operator's knowledge, and found, in all cases, very little to criticise and much to praise. In the first place, Mr. McKinnon has caused to be installed a model operating room in each theater.

The illustration here is a photo of the 23d Street Bijou Dream operating room. It is identical with all others, except that the slope of the machines varies in the different houses. In this case the drop is approximately 40 feet in the 84-foot throw. In the Union Square house it is even more than this. Yet, notwithstanding this tremendous handicap Mr. McKinnon has been able to secure excellent definition over the entire area of the pictures. Not only has he done this, but during the past year Keith & Proctor projection has become really excellent in the matter of curtain balance and even picture illumination. Twelve months ago shadowy jumpy, poorly illuminated pictures were the rule—so much so that the writer took Mr. Blackford, general manager Keith & Proctor's New York houses, to task about it. To-day these faults have practically vanished and in their place is seen a steady, brilliant, uniformly illuminated display.

Some of this splendid result must of course be attributed to the co-operation of the various operators and managers, as well as to Mr. Blackford himself in backing Mr. McKinnon up financially, but the major portion belongs of right to Mr. McKinnon.

The booths installed are all alike. They are of wood, lined with asbestos board 3/8 inch in thickness, the latter braced and secured by transverse angle irons of steel. The doors are of the sliding variety and close of their own weight. The lens and lookout holes are protected by semi-automatic shutters which close of themselves in case of fire. From ceiling to roof extends a 6-inch vent pipe which Mr. McKinnon intends to enlarge to 16 inches in diameter. In each room is a rewinding closet and a metal film cabinet, also containing shelves for supplies. This cabinet is handily arranged, has spring doors and individual metal boxes for each film. Each booth is equipped with two machines, a spotlight and dissolver. All booths are fully equipped with phone, buttons and call-bells, so that the operator may be reached from the stage or office and vice versa. At the Union Square house the drop is close to 50 feet in 84.

Mr. McKinnon has full charge of projection matters, as well as of stage electrics, in all but the Fifth Avenue house, and it is but justice to say that he has made good—yes, more than good.

THE PRECISION CAMERA COMPANY.

We notice that the Precision Camera Company has been organized under the State laws of Illinois and that the arrangements for the manufacture of the camera have been virtually completed. Mr. H. A. Aitken, president of the Western Film Exchange of Milwaukee and New York, recently stated that this company has taken by purchase the Eames patent No. 708,033, and added that the well-known patent attorneys, Kenyon and Kenyon, have given a written report stating that in their opinion the Precision camera clearly does not infringe the Edison camera patent No. 589,168, as the same has been heretofore interpreted by the courts, and that as the Precision camera has a moving lens and is continuously and positively moving film, it is therefore outside the claim of the Edison company, just as the Wagner camera was held to be outside the Edison camera in the case against the Yankee Film Company and against William Steiner, et al. It was also stated that in their opinion the camera does not infringe the Latham loop patent No. 707,934. Mr. Aitken went on to say that the camera is a complete success and is ready for the market, but the company has not formulated definite plans as yet. He spoke very optimistically of the growth of the moving picture business.

EXCESSIVE CULTURE.

"The Montclair Town Council has again spurned the film trust." This is the latest news from the city of culture. A noted preacher while upholding the doctrine of "uprightness" warned his hearers against even an excess of that virtue saying "there are some people who try to walk upright to such an extent that they nearly fall over backward." Such excessive uprightness and excessive culture when paraded so publicly has a tendency to suggest the leaning towards hypocrisy.

That this "most cultured city in America" should consider the advisability of admitting anything in their community is no doubt wise; that they should decide against everything is very unwise. As an evidence of their self-conceit, this community feels itself so immune from all contagion that they decided to prohibit compulsory vaccination in their public schools. How strange! Montclair does not fear small pox and yet is panic stricken at the mention of cinematography. It may not be strange under the circumstances for the local "protectors" to place a ban upon imported moving picture men, but when one of their own townsmen and a clergyman —the Rev. W. D. P. Bliss—came forward with an offer to himself control an exhibition, it must have been interesting to scan the puritanical countenances of the authorities as they solemnly refused.

Even the eloquently promised support of Mr. John Collier, educational secretary of the National Board of Moving Picture Censors, proved unavailing, making it apparent that a community which in matters of health refuses the advice of physicians and scientists, and in morals refuses the advice of a clergyman and specific moral authorities, needs a closer inspection into the nature of its boasted culture. If it were possible to take a "culture" of Montclair's culture, and submit it to the analysis of truth, it would without doubt be found thoroughly impregnated with the deceitful germs of vanity and conceit. The offer made by the Rev. W. Bliss was a creditable one, and any community wilfully rejecting religiously, morally and ethically censored cinematrography can no longer claim to be America's city of culture.

BIBLICAL AND RELIGIOUS PICTURES.

After a careful canvass among users of religious pictures in churches, the writer finds the moving pictures unsatisfactory. During the recent Easter season many Brooklyn churches had lectures upon "The Passion Play," illustrated by stereopticon. In no single instance were the moving pictures used, enquiry elicited the fact that the slides were preferred universally. The staged "Passion Play" has proved entirely unsatisfactory; it is repulsive rather than attractive; it is full of errors, and in some instances positively untruthful, so that no lecturer can follow it, and no one who has visited Ober-Ammergau could in any way use it. The slides are always truthful, and while not so comprehensive, afford sufficient illustrative backing for an attractive, intelligent and instructive lecture. It does not appear that this is so much a disadvantage as a lesson—the lesson being that there must be a distinction between religious and Biblical pictures. Present experiences indicate that it is impossible to reproduce satisfactory Biblical pictures. The modern tinge imparted to ancient scenes, the Anglicizing of Greek and Latin customs prove destructive of all the necessary original value such pictures require; it is folly therefore to attempt to reproduce Biblical pictures under any other condition than those of their own original settings. No American or even European surroundings can be made to serve Egyptian, Assyrian, Hebraic and Palestine purposes; neither can new world people assume old world customs upon assuming costumes of those times; it takes the people of Ober-Ammergau ten years to prepare themselves for each event; therefore Biblical pictures must wait until they can be produced under conditions and with instructors saturated with the truth belonging to them.

With religious pictures there may be much difference. Take, for instance, Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," the stereopticon slides and lecture of this remarkable story are as fresh and as much used as they were half a century ago.

To reproduce this story on a film would be one of the most profitable subjects in the world to-day; it would be a hundred times more acceptable and profitable than even a perfect Passion Play. Again, the production of this work—being comparatively modern—carries with it none of the difficulties of the Biblical pictures and only requires a literal faithfulness to the book, using as a basis the slides now so acceptable to the religious public. If one of the representative good firms were to handle this work they would aid the educational value of religious work; no mediocre work will suffice, it must be of the highest order.

A PRIESTESS OF CARTHAGE.

This latest Gaumont film is a triumph in every branch of art and science entering into the production of the highest grade of cinematography, making it possible to especially commend this firm on the excellence of their work. As a subject illustrative of the times—150 years B. C.—it has its educational value and serves to enlighten the mind of some of those peculiar features of ante-Christian idolatry, this together with the value as a high-class production are its characteristics. One whose ambitions for valuable moving pictures is great, cannot see a film of this kind without wishing that all this talent, art and beauty might be expended upon other valuable and much demanded subjects. The Gaumont firm is one of those possessing every requirement for perfect work with charming results; may they soon enter more fully into the large field awaiting them.

ILLUSTRATED POETRY.

A little while ago there appeared "Auld Robin Gray," a very acceptable production, well received, favorably commented upon; yet, without a successor—why? There are many standard works—poetry and prose—waiting the adaptation and adoption of the film manufacturer. While in many places the illustrated songs have made a welcome departure, nothing has succeeded them; there are a large number of poems—secular and religious—waiting cinematographic interpretation; with also a waiting section of the public to welcome them. Do the makers require a list? If so, let them ask for it, such a one is at hand and could be readily supplied, but the writer prefers not to presume to teach others their business. If, however, the plea is presented of any lack of "touch with the public pulse" this page will readily produce a list of satisfactory subjects. Schools—educational, secular and religious—are asking for the things about which we are writing.

Do people who object to moving picture places in their community themselves go to see moving pictures? Most assuredly they do! not only so, but enquiry elicits the fact that they are fairly good supporters of vaudeville, too. How weak becomes criticism when one becomes acquainted with the critics. It is a strange freak of truthful nature—"for truth is stranger than fiction"—that the greatest critic the city of New York ever produced (and who became the champion of critics before both the Mayor of the city and the Governor of the State) is now an usher in a certain well known circus, proving conclusively that criticism was merely professional self-seeking and perhaps with probable material benefits.

Moving pictures are growing in usefulness, not because of criticism, but in spite of it.

In a recent interview with a most progressive exhibitor the writer recently was pleased to find that the efforts and tendencies towards the educationally developed features of moving pictures proved the most satisfactory and while at times immediate profits were not always forthcoming, ultimate results proved both morally and financially satisfactory with a more highly pleased patronage.

There was quite a lively scene at the License Bureau in the City Hall of Manhattan Borough last Monday. It being the first day of May, a large number of moving picture exhibitors were on hand to get their licenses renewed, having left the matter to the last moment. On the same day the new Deputy Police Commissioner appointed to succeed Deputy Flynn was appointed and sworn, which occupied considerable of Police Commissioner Cropsey's time, and, as he has supervision of the granting of licenses for moving picture places, the applying exhibitors were obliged to wait. Some of them did not get their places open until nearly four o'clock in the afternoon. All of them, however, were glad that they got their licenses, for Commissioner Cropsey had thrown a bad scare into them by announcing that hereafter picture shows running vaudeville acts will be put in the category of first-class theaters, and their proprietors will be compelled to take out first-class licenses, the annual fee being $500. According to last reports, the Commissioner was determined to insist upon the new ruling.

Many of the exhibitors feared that no licenses covering the houses that run vaudeville acts would be renewed with payment of the big fee, but found they were mistaken. W. F. Rogers, acting chief of the license bureau, declared that no unfair advantage would be taken of anyone; that all licenses would be renewed and their continuance would depend upon the results of investigations to be instituted at once. If it is found that a house paying an annual license fee of $25 is running vaudeville acts, a demand will be made for the immediate payment of the additional $475, in default of which the license already granted will be revoked. A large number of small theater owners declare that if this is insisted upon they will be driven out of business.

The municipal authorities argue that the situation is a plain one and Police Commissioner Cropsey's ruling is only in accordance with the law. Where the entertainment consists of motion pictures, songs and recitations not rendered on a stage, a common show license, costing $25 per annum, is sufficient. This license is revocable for cause, at the discretion of the mayor. Where the entertainment consists of motion pictures coupled with vaudeville acts, a theater or concert license is required. This license is issued by the Police Department, the fee being $500 per annum, and is revocable only by the Supreme Court.

The exhibitors affected insinuate in quite distinct terms that the movement has been instigated by the large exhibitors with influence, to get the small ones out of the way so the them said last Monday "Even if I wanted to pay the theatrical license I could not get it because my place is not large enough or adapted to comply with all the requirements exacted for such a license. In other words, it is not a question of vaudeville with me, but of existence. A big theater was opened in my neighborhood and with a long programme of pictures they put on several acts of vaudeville. It was up to me to put on some vaudeville or go out of business. I made arrangements to secure a couple of vaudeville acts and, with my lower price of admission, I have succeeded in holding on to my business. If I am to pay an additional $475 for a license, then I am done for. Even if my house could meet the requirements for a theatrical license and I could not have to make extensive alterations, and had the money to put on, I could not get room enough for increased seating capacity, and my patrons would not stand for an increase of prices. Should I be required to make alterations, my seating capacity would be greatly reduced. Add my loss on this to the cost of the changes and the $475 more a year for my license and you will find I could not have carfare left."

A municipal officer who heard this statement said the position of the exhibitor appeared to be an unfortunate one. It is a position for which neither the law nor the authorities are responsible. He said it was quite plain to him that the law was one of the strong against the weak. The smaller exhibitors have been gradually encroaching upon the vaudeville field, although only operating under a $25 license, and the people paying the $500 license have been complaining of discrimination. People paying the smaller fee, he said, must stick to pictures unattended by any stage appearances. The moment they put a stage into play they must assume the responsibilities of theatrical managers.

Among those present last Monday was the proprietor of a large picture house paying the high license fee. He was present to urge, if necessary, the enforcement of the laws. He did not feel called upon to speak publicly, but gave expression to his views in private. Among other things, he said: "There is no concerted action in this matter on the part of the large picture theater owners. It is not necessary. We are getting the business and by our greater outlay of money and better offerings of pictures and vaudeville acts we will gradually take from the little fellows any business they still hold, even if the laws are not enforced. We all know that it is a question of but a short time when the little men will have either to come up to our standard or go out of business. But now that the question has been raised, why should the laws not be enforced? Storerooms were never intended, nor should they be tolerated as vaudeville theaters. We go to the expense of thousands of dollars to buy ample pieces of property and erect suitable theaters. We also expend thousands in fitting them up in compliance with all the laws and the comfort of the public. We make them attractive, safe and enjoyable and pay our license fee of $500 annually. We do all that is required, and all others who want to run theaters should do the same. We have no complaint to make against the man who runs pictures and adds illustrated songs and other attractions to his programme that are not stage performances, nor do we care if his admission price is two-for-five. If he can get away with it and make money we give him credit. We can hold our own. But let me tell you that the nickelodeon vaudeville is the worst growth that has ever taken root in the field of amusements, and we have a perfect right to complain of it. The vaudeville acts in such places are abominable in almost all cases. But what can you expect at the prices paid for them. Imagine a single act being on the market for from $3 to $8 a day and a double act for from $6 to $10, and in a great number of cases only one day at a place. A nickelodeon manager wanted to bet me the other day we were not paying more for our acts. I hadn't the heart to take his money. Our acts work from three to seven days in our place and have the advantage of circuits. Even if we paid only what I say the small people are paying, the performers would be far better off than those doing nickelodeon work. But if you could see our salary lists you would find the names of many clever and well known performers on them, and at good prices too."

One of the oldest and best known men in the moving picture field stated since the license stir was started that anyone who has watched the public business for the past three or four years must have expected what is about to happen. The owners of small picture theaters—the nickelodeons, storeroom shows—are the people who have been conducting for a long time that moving pictures had seen their best days and were fast dying out. They have been speaking from their own standpoint, giving voice to prophecies born of dread inspired by the steady encroachment of large capital on the field. The small theaters, he said with some regret, will in time die out, but the pictures will remain. The large, modern theaters will continue to exhibit them. Some will maintain prices within the reach of the poorer class of people, but others will in time cater to the other class at prices ranging from 25c. to $1, as is the case in many cities in Great Britain and on the continent. This man stated that at one time he believed the small house would not die out entirely. He thought that by parts of them populated by the poor people only the 5-cent shows could be maintained, but he is gradually changing his mind on this proposition, and cites as instances in the east side of New York City, where a $20,000 picture house is to be erected. He was asked if that place could not be a 5-cent theater and an swered that the amount to be invested in the building alone showed that the promoters looked for more than a nickel in the slot business.

Let us all hope and strive for one result—the advancement and improvement of the motion picture business as a whole, whatever the present situation may develop. It is claimed that more than 500,000 people patronize the picture shows daily in Greater New York, there being approximately 450 motion picture shows under a common show license, and 200 under a concert or theatrical license. This is found for serious reflection. Constant improvement, relentless energy and the best of judgment must be exercised to hold and increase this patronage. It is hoped this can be accomplished with injury to as few as possible, since it seems quite clear that some must step aside to make room for the more aggressive, and it must be remembered that the success of the pictures is not dependent upon the multiplicity of theaters.

The Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York.

Since the inauguration of the Exhibitors' League of the Greater City, moving picture men here are waking up to the fact that they will have to get out and work earnestly and together, if they are to obtain regulations governing their business just enough to ensure them, as it seems, a fighting chance of success. The first need is that they do get together solidly, one and all, laying aside all petty differences, at least until they can get a law passed that will recognize that moving picture shows, when properly conducted, have a legitimate position in society like other businesses, with definite rights that can not be gainsaid by small-minded and misinformed individuals. The critics of moving picture shows may have the good of society, or they may have merely their own good at heart; but, at present they surely have these shows, so useful and so little harmful as they are, at a sad disadvantage. To-day moving picture shows are worse off than liquor-saloons, for saloons at least have a definite position and are not at the mercy of separate individuals as the little theaters are to-day here in Greater New York.

The Exhibitors' League is doing its best to make all the moving picture showmen in the city realize in what a precarious position their business is. At its last weekly meeting, the Committee on Legislation was appointed, consisting of Tobias A. Hyman, chairman, and Victor Orlando, S. J. Jones, C. Johanasen and S. Kiesler. The office of Tobias Keppler is at 320 Broadway, New York,; he is a lawyer and is also counsel for the League.

Mr. Keppler, in outlining the direction along which he and his committee intend to work, said that he will endeavor to have a law passed making it mandatory to issue a license to anybody, irrespective of the objection of neighbors, provided that the moving picture theater otherwise complies with all legal requirements, as to safety, etc. He pointed out that at present there is no law whatever regulating the issuing of licenses to moving picture exhibitors. There are in New York City to-day in the neighborhood of a hundred businesses which require licenses, as pedlers, moving vans, bootblack stands, hackmen, theaters and motion picture shows. Licenses are issued to people in these businesses by the Mayor's Bureau of Licenses. At present it is entirely discretionary with the chief of the Bureau of Licenses whether or not a license to a moving picture theater shall be granted or even renewed. Recently a license was refused by the Bureau because the pastor of a church near the site of the proposed show didn't approve of having them in the neighborhood. From this and later practices of the Bureau it has come to be considered as a rule of the office that no license shall be issued or renewed where the pastor of the nearest church in the immediate neighborhood or the principal of the public school object to it. Without considering the possibilities of petty feeling entering into the transaction, this leaves the moving picture business subject to he idiosyncrasies of individuals who may not be in any way competent to judge of these shows.

Mr. Keppler also hopes to have a provision made in the charter to have the licenses issued to moving picture exhibitors by a bureau separate from the one issuing licenses to larger theaters. The regular theaters have a strong organization behind them and they are the natural foes of these new moving picture shows. He illustrated the need of having the bureaus that issue licenses to these two separate, by pointing out that in London the theater interests have had power enough to compel the picture exhibitors to pay for a concert license (.$500) before they can have even a piano in their halls. By keeping the two bureaus separate he thinks that the influence of the theater interests will have less power to harm the moving picture business.

Mr. Keppler is also collecting all laws and regulations in existence affecting the moving picture business, so that sensible bills may be drafted and introduced in the legislature and ordinances in the Board of Aldermen, with a view to remedying the present chaotic condition of government by rules of this business. Under this heading he pointed out that with four or five different city departments supervising the business, with one having charge of this and another having charge of that, that any one of five commissioners could shut down every moving picture show in the city, if he saw fit. A good illustration of how these numerous rules may work a temporary injustice or worse, came up while we were talking with Mr. Keppler in his office. The telephone bell rang and one of the members of the League called up from Brooklyn and said that the evening before when his house was nearly full, five or six patrons came in. They were standing in the aisle, while he was hunting seats for them, two and three together. The officer on post there remonstrated and the exhibitor explained the situation. The officer then demanded that they be seated at once. The exhibitor pointed out to the officer that his remonstrance alone was causing delay in this. The people at length were seated, nevertheless, the following afternoon the exhibitor was summoned. This is, of course, the exhibitor's own ex-parte story which we did not investigate, but it may speak to the experience of other exhibitors and we report it for what it is worth.

Last week, Mr. Keppler appeared before the Board of Superintendents of Buildings of the five boroughs and explained to them that the present regulations governing the construction of airdomes was in most cases prohibitive. It is now required that these open-air shows be furnished with a cement floor and have toilets needing an attachment with the sewer and running water as well. These open theaters of course can be run only in warm weather and usually occupy space that is only temporarily vacant. In only a few cases could they be made to pay, under such conditions, perhaps in no case. Nor is a cement floor actually needed for the healthiness of such places. It has never been required for other exhibitions and shows occupying a tent, such as circuses, or gospel tents, camp meetings, etc. Nor have such places to install running water and toilets.

Mr. Keppler also desires to obtain a regulation permitting such exhibitors who employ a licensed matron to admit children between the hours of 3 and 7 p. m., even when not accompanied by any older person. These may be kept in a separate section away from the older patrons and be as safe from moral contamination while at the show as while in school. When it is recognized that these shows are not harmful in themselves, but very beneficial, educating and instructing in some ways more effectively than any other means we have, we fail to see how any fair argument can be advanced against this proposition.

After contrasting the possibilities of good that can come if all exhibitors get together and work with the League, against the possibilities of danger and ill that may come if the exhibitors do not take action till too late, Mr. Keppler made a strong plea to exhibitors, begging each and every one of them to wake up and realize that they have many enemies, thoughtless and otherwise, and that if they remain asleep such harm will be done as will take many times the effort to correct. The Moving Picture World heartily seconds this plea. The Exhibitors' League has come in the nick of time. The work must be done and it can not be done by one or two self-sacrificing enthusiastic individuals, but by all. All exhibitors must realize that the League is working for them and for their business good; and it is dependent for its authority and its power on each and every individual in the business. No one has a right to stay away while others are working for his good. Every exhibitor in New York City has a plain business duty before him and the first step in that duty is to get together in harmony.

Waukegan, Ill.—Mr. H. C. Luedtke recently bought from his partner, E. V. Orvis, the latter's interest in the Star Theater, Waukegan, Ill., and is now sole proprietor of that house. The theater has been thoroughly remodeled and is now under full swing, using Independent service, with special attention to musical features. The efforts of the management are being appreciated by the public in a substantial way, as full houses are the reward of enterprise and energy. Mr. Luedtke is also making arrangements to open a high-class vaudeville theater in the Phoenix Building, Ravenswood, Ill. The house will be thoroughly up to date and will have a seating capacity of 650. Mr. Arthur McDonald will manage the new house.

Chicago.

East Thirty-First Street is a busy street, and though it is less than a mile long it has some five theaters on it. At Cottage Grove Avenue there is the Thirty-First Street Theater, which has had a varied career with stock and vaudeville, and is now running pictures and vaudeville at an admission price of ten cents. I say pictures first, because the program consists of three reels of pictures and but two acts of vaudeville, which is, however, of higher quality than usual. The pictures are well shown, steady and pretty well lighted, though the curtain is not what it should be; it is of some comparatively dark blue compound, which much deadens the brilliancy of the light. The pictures I saw were a first run Imp, a third run Itala comedy, and a month-old Rex, which goes pretty far to confirm Manager Battershall's statement on his hand-bills that he will give the best service in the city. The films are supplied by the Hirsh & H. Film Service Company. That the people like the show offered by Mr. Battershall is attested by the large attendance at his theater.

At Calumet Avenue is the Franklin Theater, a vaudeville house, showing one reel of pictures and four or five acts. The picture is a fairly new Independent reel, and is put on very well, with even, bright illumination and steady projection.

The Delphi Theater, at Prairie Avenue, is the only house on the street showing licensed films, and is well patronized on that account. The picture is well projected, though much of the time it is run rather fast because of the people waiting outside. The program consists of three reels and a song.

The Ideal Theater, near Indiana Avenue, is the oldest moving picture theater on the street, having been started in 1907 or 1908. The projection in this theater is equal to any I have ever seen, and superior to the average. This was not always the case, for the operator, Raymond Cahill, says that when he and his father took the theater in 1909 it had the name of showing the poorest pictures on the street. Due to his hard work, the projection has been improved until it surpasses the usual thing very much. The pictures on the screen at the Ideal possess in a remarkable degree that elusive stereoscopic quality which is missing in so many others. Operator Cahill is using something like 40 amperes of direct current on a picture not quite 11 feet wide, which partly accounts for the brilliancy of his picture. The machine in use is a new Powers' No. 6, and has given the highest satisfaction with its flickerless and steady pictures, a matter of great importance in a small house with many of the seats near the screen. The program consists of three reels; but though this is cut down on Saturday and Sunday to two, the people consider that they have had their money's worth, because of the excellence of the projection and the selection of the subjects, and the fact that the films are not rushed. In fact, though one of Manager Cahill's competitors has tried his best to capture some of his business by running four reels and showing first-run stuff, many people prefer to wait until they can see the films at the Ideal a day or two later. It is a common thing to see people waiting outside the Ideal Theater at ten o'clock, but they do wait, because they are sure of seeing a good show inside. I saw the magnificent Itala production "The Fall of Troy" here last Sunday, and was much impressed with its beauty. Mr. Cahill told me that it had broken all records for the house, and that many people came back two and three times to see it again. Mr. Cahill is a firm believer in the quality of the best foreign films, and says that they have helped materially to build up his business, though the American films are much appreciated by his patrons.

The Bon Ton Theater, just west of Indiana Avenue, is showing four reels of Independent films, most of them old, though the first reel is often a first run. Projection in this theater is not at all up to the standard set by the other theaters on the street, and it is not as well patronized as it might be. No operator can do himself justice with a four reel show to rush through, and the projection at the Bon Ton shows this. The people on Thirty First Street are educated up to like well projected pictures, and it is unwise to try to meet the competition of quality with mere quantity. When the manager of the Bon Ton realizes this, his theater may become a paying investment.

The Illinois Theater, on Wentworth Avenue, is another picture house which enjoys good projection. Though the throw is very long, about 90 or 100 feet, the picture is very brilliant, despite the fact that the side lights, except those nearest the screen, are not shaded at all, and the volume of light in the house is surprising. The screen is coated with some aluminum preparation, partly accounting for the bright picture, but its brilliancy is mostly due to the careful handling of the light by Operator Bergstrom. Licensed pictures have always been used in this house. Manager Katz evidently believes in good music to the pictures, for a three-piece orchestra plays to them pretty well.

Lindskog's Theater, just west of Wentworth on Thirty-First Street, is an example of a large hall making money with motion pictures which would otherwise be idle much of the time. It seats at least four or five hundred, and is packed every night. Three reels of Independent films are shown. The picture is large, about 15 or 16 feet wide, and is very well lighted considering its size, but it loses much in brilliancy through not properly shading the screen from the side and exit lights. If this were attended to, the picture would be much improved in quality.

The Merit Theater, at Thirty-Fifth and State Streets, is a small house patronized almost exclusively by colored people. Independent films are shown, which were fairly well projected when I saw them, though there was considerable vibration and jump in the picture which could not at all have been due to bad perforations. The show is run continuously, two machines being used, the end of one film dissolving into the title of the next.

The Star Theater, on State near Thirty-Ninth Street, is showing an excellent picture, despite the disadvantage of a bad throw otherwise and downward. Two reels of Independent pictures, with two songs, constitute the program. The Star was originally built as a twin affair, two theaters side by side, one showing pictures for five cents, and the other vaudeville for ten, but that policy was dropped and pictures alone are shown, the partition between the two houses being removed, making one large auditorium.

Down on Morgan Street, near Thirty-Third Street, I found a little picture house without even a name, all by itself, within which there was a picture whose projection was absolutely above criticism. The picture was not only perfectly steady but it had much depth and considerable stereoscopic effect. The light was bright and very well handled. There seemed to be the trace of a tendency to run more than six reels were run off. The doorman said proudly: "You don't see such pictures on Halstead Street," and mentioned the fact that the operator, Mr. Almeron Field, was the owner of the house. Mr. Field is certainly worthy of the title "operator" in the highest sense of the word. The show consists of two reels and a song, but the people are pleased with it because of its quality and do not ask for more. The films I saw were a Reliance and a very fine old Itala, "The Two Sergeants." It was towards this latter picture that the doorman's praise was directed.

The People's Palace Theater, corner of Van Buren and Levitt Streets, formerly owned and managed by W. H. Quinn, has been purchased by Thomas Patrick Keys of the Theater Sales Company. Mr. Keys states that the house will be remodeled and redecorated and will be made one of the most beautiful and up-to-date theaters in Chicago. The seating capacity of the house is 1,500 and it is expected that with a good bill of vaudeville and pictures at five and ten cents, the house will be packed at every performance.

Mr. W. S. Brown has purchased the Crystal Palace Theater, 3255 Ogden Avenue. The same policy of the house will be adhered to and a good show of Independent releases will be furnished. The house was formerly owned by Mr. Thomas P. Keys, who has recently taken over the People's Palace Theater.

Down in the heart of Chicago's Little Italy (Ohio Street near Milwaukee Avenue) The Humboldt Family Theater is completing its first year as a picture house and its success is considered phenomenal among theatrical circles of the city. The Humboldt is one of the oldest china houses in the city and was first opened as the Scandia Hall. After several seasons of failure it was sold and remained under the name of The Crane Theater. The crane meeting with the same fate as the Scandia, was shut down and after several months opened again as the Garibaldi, as Italian Theater showing Italian films and circus vaudeville. The Garibaldi failed to make good and the house was again shut down. Mr. Scalfman of the Royal Realty and Investment Co., being enterprising, took over the Garibaldi and after remodeling re-opened the doors of the Humboldt Family Theater as an Independent picture house with a good show for five cents. Under the management of Mr. J. Mandelone an experienced showman, the natives of the Italian quarter are now receiving the entertainment they have wished for and with three good reels of pictures and two acts of vaudeville there is no difficulty in packing the house at every performance. Report of the National Board of Censorship.

Prepared by the Executive Committee on Instructions from the General Committee of the Censorship. Including a Reply to Certain Criticisms Which Had Been Directed Against the Board.

At a meeting of the National Board of Censorship on April 12, 1911, the chairman was instructed to appoint a committee to prepare for publication a summary report on the work since its foundation. And, at the request of the chairman, the executive committee has prepared the report (in part) as follows:

Beginning with June, 1909, the censorship passed out of its experimental stage and became complete and authoritative for about seventy (70) per cent. of all the motion pictures produced week by week for the American market. In November, 1910, arrangements were completed which brought under the censorship all motion pictures destined to pass through regular trade channels to the show houses of America. This status now maintains.

The censorship publishes an up-to-date list of those manufacturers who submi. all of their product to the board of censorship, this list being incorporated in the present report. It includes at present all the manufacturers known to be releasing pictures for exhibition in the motion picture shows of the United States.

Statistically, we find that the board has passed on some 5,200 subjects in the term of its existence. Each subject was destined, on the average, to be duplicated about seventy-five times, and each of these duplicate copies was destined to be seen by several score thousand people. The censorship has never vaunted its work of mere destruction, the object being to minimize this element, but the records show indisputably that, at the very least, two million (2,000,000) feet of objectionable film have been kept off the American market. This represents an absolute value of $200,000, the amount of financial loss which the motion picture manufacturers have voluntarily sustained in submitting to the board of censorship.

There are two classes of pictures which do not come within the power of the board. The first are pictures called in the trade, "Special Features"; the other class of pictures, which in the nature of the case can never be brought regularly under the board of censorship, are such pictures as may be secretly produced and circulated secretly and criminally. We have reason to believe that there have been some such pictures, which are violations of the criminal statutes of any State where they are exhibited, and which are to be classed with the obscene post-card and similar outrages against decency. We can find record of no definite instance where such an obscene picture has strayed into a regular theater or showhouse, as pictures of this type are produced before gatherings of people who are expecting an obscene production, and who know that the exhibition will be pursued by the local authorities in any case where information leading to an arrest and conviction can be obtained.

It would require many pages for your committee to make plain in all its details the trade situation and distributing system on which the work of the board of censorship is built. No intelligent estimate of the really great authority of the board of censorship can be formed by any one who does not understand these conditions of the motion picture art and business. They have been explained with considerable minuteness in various publications of the board of censorship. We are satisfied that more than ninety-nine (99) per cent. of all pictures publicly exhibited in America, under any conditions, are censored by the board of censorship before they go onto the market. We, furthermore, consider it fully established that the verdicts of the board are, with approximate completeness, carried out in every part of the country. The board conducts local inspection of the New York theaters and has correspondence with about fifty cities from the Atlantic to the Pacific, who receive weekly reports from the board, and many of whom carry on continuous investigation into the motion picture shows. Communications from some of these correspondents are included in the appendix of this report. It is true, in addition, that it is the manufacturers of motion pictures themselves who are most determined that the verdicts of the board shall be carried out. Those manufacturers who desire to maintain a high standard (the great majority of all manufacturers and the dominant factors in the trade), value the censorship because of its restraining influence on the less cautious or irresponsible members of the trade, and it is of great commercial importance to every ambitious manufacturer that the censorship be both thoroughly effective and as stringent as the conditions of the public mind and the resources of the motion picture allow.

The Executive Personnel.

We would report finally, under this section, that the censoring committee, made up of volunteers, works continuously and with a faithfulness deserving the highest public thanks. The salaried executive secretaries, Messrs. Storey and Hopkins, have studied deeply the problem of motion pictures. They are not voting members of the censoring committee, but their advisory counsel in shaping the judgments on pictures is invaluable. The other staff member, Mr. Collier, acts as educational secretary, and exerts, on behalf of the People's Institute, a general supervisory power over administrative details. His work is largely in the purely educational field, encouraging the wider use of motion pictures in schools, churches, etc., influencing the actual production of pictures with a specific educational design, and consulting with many communities as to the best methods for solving the vexed problem of local regulation.

The Relation of the General Committee to the Censoring Committee.

The general committee is the ultimate sponsor for the work of the board of censorship. It determines standards of censorship and all matters of policy and likewise of finance for the board. Since the beginning of the censorship, the following rule has maintained: Where the censoring committee has a divided vote on a given picture, or where any member, or the secretary, or the manufacturer involved, feels that the judgment of the general committee should be consulted, the picture is appealed to the general committee, which passes on it with final power. We find that of 178 pictures which have been condemned or altered by the censoring committee, there have been twelve appeals to the general committee, with the following result: The general committee has pruned or altered (eliminating or substituting scenes) six pictures and has destroyed six. In other words, the general committee, far from being, as has been charged, over-lenient, is very stringent in its judgments.

The Relation of the Board of Censorship to Local Initiative, Especially in New York.

The board of censorship co-operates in any way possible with local initiative, official or unofficial, except that the board does not undertake to carry out punitive prosecutions for violations by local shows. The board probably has a larger volume of up-to-date information about motion picture conditions in New York than any other one organization, but has bent its main efforts in New York City toward securing certain fundamental reforms, which have now been rather widely advertised, which have been recommended by the commissioner of accounts, and which are now before the city officials. We are interested to discover that the three main reforms proposed by the commissioner of accounts in his admirable report to Mayor Gaynor, namely, the concentration of municipal responsibility for motion picture shows, the formulation of complete ordinances regulating these shows, and the enlargement of seating capacity, now limited to three hundred or less—that these three main reforms were pressed on the attention of the city officials more than three years ago, one year prior to the creation of the board of censorship, by the Cheap Amusement Committee, which jointly represented the Woman's Municipal League, the Charity Organization Society, and The People's Institute.

Toward any local censorship of motion pictures the National board maintains the most co-operative relation possible under the given circumstances. The National board has always recognized that it could not demand that any community should unconditionally surrender to the National board the censorship of motion pictures within that community. On the other hand, no local censorship, no matter how empowered, could take the place of the National board. Most American cities have, either tacitly or through police order, delegated the powers of censorship to the National Board of Censorship, but the National board has never asked for any such delegation of power.

The Financial Aspects of the Work.

It has been charged in certain quarters that the People's Institute and the Board of Censorship have maintained secrecy as to the fact that the major portion of the financial support of the censorship came from motion picture trade interests. We find that this charge is without foundation. We find, as a matter of fact, that from the first day an almost redundant amount of publicity has been given by the People's Institute and the Board of Censorship, to the fact that the trade interests largely sustain the censorship financially, and we are at a loss to understand the constant repetition from certain quarters of a charge of secrecy which is so entirely baseless.

The People's Institute expended, on behalf of the National Board of Censorship, from June 8, 1909, to January 1, 1910, $2,830.48. The People's Institute deposited to the credit of the Board of Censorship, between January 1, 1910, and April 1, 1911, $8,198.44. The source from which the People's Institute received these moneys is indicated in the tabulated statement appended hereto, furnished by the People's Institute. We are further informed by the treasurer of the People's Institute that the totals herewith represent all moneys that have been received by the People's Institute either from those understood to have a pecuniary interest in motion pictures, and all moneys from any source whatsoever designated by the donors for use in motion picture work. There stood deposited to the credit of the censorship on April 1, 1911, $955, the difference between the total receipts from all sources and total expenditures to that date.

There have been special contributions for special pieces of work of the Board of Censorship, which do not appear in the tabulated statement, as follows:

[These amount to $442.95. We have not itemized account for lack of space. To this must be added the contribution of the executive services of the People's Institute, which represents a drain on its treasury of about $4,000.—ED.]

No personal compensation may be received by the secretaries for any service which they can legitimately be called on to render in their official capacity; and under no condition may personal compensation be accepted from any individual or company commercially concerned with motion pictures. Any member of the board will be free to write and sell literary articles on motion pictures or to receive compensation for public addresses on the subject, or for special work on investigations carried on for educational or philanthropic foundations, which matters would be entirely personal to the individuals involved.

Conclusion.

In spite of exhaustive publicity; in spite of the universal recognition of the steady and great improvement of motion pictures under the pressure of the Board of Censorship; in spite of the personnel of the general and the censoring committee of the board, and of the total separation between the judicial and policy-determining work of the board and the receipt or disbursement of money involved in maintaining the machinery of the work; in spite of the standing invitation of the board for any form of investigation, official or unofficial, of its methods and results; in spite of the constant effort of the People's Institute and of the Board of Censorship to make all the above conditions clear, even to the least attentive observer; there has continued a certain amount of criticism, invidious, vague in character, yet none the less hurtful. This criticism, involving the reiteration of indefinite charges which have been repeatedly disproved, as far as indefinite charges can be disproved, has been systematically promoted in late months by certain agencies in New York City. It is with the hope of fully satisfying such criticisms that the executive committee, under instructions from the general committee, has prepared the present report.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE NATIONAL BOARD OF CENSORSHIP.

THE PRESTO EMERGENCY CLAMP.

No matter how careful or how competent the operator may be, and no matter how efficiently the house may be managed, it is a fact that so long as metal is subjected to the action of heat, there will be to some extent, the liability to breakage in carbon clamps and carbon jaws. A new device called the Presto Emergency Clamp has recently been placed on the market. This clamp is designed to be quickly attached to the lamp in case the regular carbon clamp or jaw breaks. The directions read: "Bite wire off clean and close in clamp, including insulation. Press clamp together with pliers and place over carbon. Tighten thumb screw until good contact is made. All of which is perfectly practical and an operation quickly performed. There is nothing more annoying to an audience than to be dismissed on account of breakage in the operating room. With this device the dismissal of audiences or even an appreciable delay in the performance is avoided. It is therefore and on this ground to be recommended. An illustration of this clamp can be seen in our advertising pages.

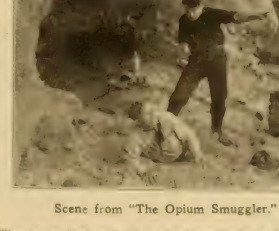
Notable Films.

By the American Film Mfg. Co. for the Coming Week.

The Western representative of the Moving Picture World was specially invited to a private exhibition of the American Film Mfg. Co. the other day to see some pictures shortly to be released. The first subject on the screen was "The Sheriff's Captive"—a thrilling story of the Golden West—how a young sheriff met his Waterloo by the daughter of the man he was going to capture and was made a prisoner himself under the spell of two entrancing eyes—a prisoner for life. The story is well told in a beautiful background of magnificent Western scenery and full of human interest and vivid action.

"The Opium Smuggler" was the next reel—a story from the historic waters of old Monterey Bay on the Californian coast. The plot is quite interesting and gives an opportunity of a thrilling story well carried out, but the strength of the film is its gorgeous scenery of water and cliffs and some really remarkable and astonishing pictures of a man thrown on the rocks by the waves of an angry ocean and the realistic and appealing struggle of a drowning person.

The last picture we were shown was "The Ranchman's Vengeance"—a negative which just had come in that very same morning from the coast and run off for our special benefit. We were told that this film was something remarkable and, even though unaccustomed to judge a picture by the negative, we felt more than satisfied that the American Film Mfg. Co. in this picture accomplished a very creditable picture play.



Scene from "The Opium Smuggler."

The story is a tale of man's ingratitude and a woman's weakness—a woman who forgets her duties as a wife and mother and listens to a man her husband saved from death in the desert and given hospitality in his home. The husband is informed of the treachery and surprises the pair. His love for his wife spares them both, but he swears vengeance if the man doesn't take care of the woman and treat her right. Then he departs from the graveyard of his crushed illusions. But the warning is not heeded, when the intoxication of love is over the real character of the man appears in its true light and frequently he abuses and mistreats the unfortunate woman. His father can't stand this any longer, and knowing her husband's whereabouts he writes him to come home. We see the mother get the telegram at the "roundup" among cowboys in real cattle country. He hurries back and comes just in time to prevent the man killing his wife in a fit of drunkenness. But the shock of fright and seeing her husband back again kills the woman and now the day of reckoning has come. He turns accusingly to the wrecker of his life and at the point of a pistol drives the culprit over the cliffs to a precipice. The man begs on his knees for an even chance and the avenger throws his gun away and we see them in a hand to hand fight on the edge of the precipice. The rancher finally gains the victory and plunges his victim down to the gulf below. The final scene shows the broken-hearted husband at the grave of his wife and the touching picture of his little daughter trying to console and comfort her father.

In exquisite scenery and brilliant photography this film even surpasses the two others and interesting several months between the work on a strong ranch and clearing of the lambs. The fight on the cliff we were told was quite a contretemps performance and the villain, not a dummy, was actually pitched from a great height to the gulf below.

Los Angeles.

By Richard V. Spencer.

Selig.—Miss Iva Shepard, leading woman of the Selig Stock Company, was last week the victim of a distressing accident. While working in an interior scene at the studio, Miss Shepard broke two bones in her right foot. The accident happened during the progress of a fire scene that the company were staging. Part of the scene business called for Miss Shepard to leap from a window from a supposedly great height, although in making the picture the height was only about five feet to the cement floor of the studio. Precautions had been taken against accident and the young lady was to alight on a mattress out of range of the camera. In alighting the accident happened. Miss Shepard at first thought that it was only a sprain, but when a doctor was called and made an examination of the injury he discovered that two bones had been broken. It will be at least a month before Miss Shepard can again return to work.

Mr. Robert Leonard, formerly a member of the Selig Stock Company, has left the company and returned to the legitimate, having rejoined the Hartman Comic Opera Company, playing at the Grand in this city. "The Campus," a musical play produced at the Grand, has just terminated a run of sixteen weeks or 162 performances, breaking all musical comedy stock run records.

Mr. Fred Siegert, of the California Motion Picture Company, an Independent concern whose negatives were seized by the United States Marshal following a recent decision in the local Government Circuit Court, who ordered the negatives he had made destroyed because he had used an infringing camera to manufacture them, is said to have left the State. The studio that he started to erect in this city is still incomplete and will in all probability be abandoned.

Moving Pictures in Schools.—State Superintendent of Public Instruction Hyatt will in the near future release a circular to the county school superintendents advocating the use of moving pictures in the public schools of the State as a means of instruction. In backing the plan he is quoted as saying:

"The possibilities of moving pictures in educational work are immense, and so far have been overlooked entirely throughout the country. So far as I can see, no better investment could be made by county superintendents than in a moving picture outfit. This could be sent about to all the schools in the county in rotation to the great profit of all the pupils, and an increased interest in the work which might be supplemented by the films sent out."

Incorporation.—Articles of incorporation were filed yesterday by the Hanrahan-Lockwood Amusement Company. Directors: Thomas Garner, T. J. Hanrahan, Thomas F. Cantwell and M. Gochenouer. Capital stock, $25,000; subscribed, $50.

Church to Show Films.—An ordinance permitting the giving of moving picture exhibitions in frame schoolhouses and churches, with certain restrictions, will be drawn by the city attorney by order of the legislation committee of the City Council, the chairman of which is Councilman Andrews, who also was instrumental in having previous contemplated legislation against picture theaters pigeon-holed. The ordinance will be designed primarily to give relief to the Salem Congregational Church, Twenty-eighth Street and Paloma Avenue, the pastor of which wishes to show moving pictures, but has been unable to do so because of a provision in the city ordinance prohibiting such exhibitions in frame buildings. The pastor of the church, B. H. Reutopohler, recently appeared before the City Council and asked that the ordinance be amended to permit him to show films in his frame church. It was suggested that a provision be inserted in the contemplated ordinance excluding exhibitions of this kind in frame buildings where an admission fee is charged. This was suggested in order to prevent the entering of commercialism into the question. Most of the city's private assembly halls, it was pointed out, were not equipped with sufficient exits to have them included in the proposed ordinance. The ordinance will be drawn up by Assistant City Attorney Robertson, and will be presented to the legislative committee a week hence for their consideration.

Incorporation.—The American Amusement Association have filed articles of incorporation. The directors of the corporation are William H. Clune, B. A. Wheelock, J. M. Boland. Capital stock, $30,000. The corporation has begun the erection of Clune's Ocean Park Theater on the new Fraser pier.

Incorporation.—The Life Film Company have filed articles of incorporation. The directors are T. K. Peters, James Ferdon, G. W. Remalia, H. A. Curtis and J. J. Thomas. Capital stock, $50,000; subscribed, $25.

Advertising Film.—An hour of moving pictures relative to the rubber industry, together with instructive and interesting lectures in explanation, will be given at the Auditorium Theater, one of the largest theaters in the United States, Tuesday evening the 25th, by F. M. Tillisch, special representative of the B. F. Goodrich Company, of Akron, Ohio.

The company that Mr. Tillisch represents are extensively interested in the manufacture of automobile tires and other rubber goods, and have at tremendous expense made a series of moving picture films describing in detail the production of commercial rubber from the time it leaves the rubber tree until, undergoing various manufacturing processes, it emerges a finished article. These films will be shown free to all automobile dealers, dealers in rubber goods, autoists, and other people interested in the rubber industry. Mr. Tillisch, who is an expert in the rubber industry, will accompany the films with an interesting lecture.

The first reel shows scenes in the jungles of Brazil along the banks of the Amazon River and its tributaries, from whence comes the best grade of rubber. Districts containing the rubber trees are leased by the Brazilian Government to the various rubber companies, who fit out native expeditions to gather the crude rubber. The film goes on to show the natives tapping the rubber trees to get the sap crude rubber, which is later worked into biscuits and transported down the Amazon to tidewater and the rubber markets.

The crude bricks of rubber are then loaded on coasting freighters and transported to American ports, and are then shipped by rail to the Goodrich factory in Ohio. Cotton and other products also being important factors in the manufacture of auto tires, the different methods of obtaining these products are also shown. Then follow scenes in the Goodrich factory showing the transformation of the crude rubber from its crude state into finished automobile tires, rubber garments, etc.

The closing reel shows the automobile races at Atlanta in 1909. Mr. Tillisch has been showing the films and lecturing in most of the important cities in the country. The films have been extremely much in demand and approval of automobile dealers and those interested in the trade, and there is every reason to believe that the Goodrich Company will derive from the advertising a thousand dollars to every one they expended in the cost of making the film and the expense attending its exhibition to the trade.

National Installs Daylight Curtain.—The National Moving Picture Theater on Main Street, opposite Clune's Main Street Theater, have installed a daylight screen.

Wonderland Goes Independent.—The Wonderland Moving Picture Theater, Main Street, between 3d and 4th, have changed their service from Licensed to Independent, and are now showing four reels of the latter.

New Independent Theater Opens.—The Novelty, 136 South Main Street, a new theater, opened Saturday the 22d, to good business. The new theater is showing four first and second run Independent films, and will make three changes of program per week. Marks & Laventhal are the proprietors.

Butler's.—The new Independent theater on Hill Street, scheduled to open Saturday the 22d, was forced to postpone its opening until Monday the 24th, on account of uncompleted work. The theater opened Monday evening, the opening being marked by floral displays in the lobby, the gifts of friends and business associates. The theater will be reviewed in detail in a later issue of the "World."

New Licensed Theater Opens.—The Lyric, Spring Street, between 1st and 2d Streets, opened Monday night the 24th. This is the first theater to be erected in the block. The theater is equipped with wooden opera chairs with iron standards, seats 400, and is finely decorated. The principal feature of the new house is the beautiful, spacious foyer with its marble, mahogany woodwork and art glass. The house is using a three piece orchestra. Three Licensed films and three vaudeville acts are shown. The craze for "pop" vaudeville and pictures seems to have struck the fancy of Western picture fans. The proprietors of these combination houses report the business, and what at first was looked upon as an innovation, threatens to become a permanent institution. The new theater is under the management of the Metropolitan Realty & Amusement Company, who occupy a suite of offices in the Wright & Callender Building.

Independent Business Improving.—The Independents are again coming rapidly to the front in the matter of erecting new theaters. Two new Independent theaters opened this week and one Licensed. Miles Brothers Exchange is said to be the only local Independent Exchange that is buying the product of the Sales Company. They are using twelve reels now and will increase their buying as rapidly as conditions justify the investment.

New England.

Chief of Police Henry D. Cowles, of New Haven, Conn., is not at all friendly to the moving picture. He recently stated that the moving picture theaters of his city have a tendency to promote vice, and that legislation of some kind should be enacted immediately, providing for a general supervision over them. The chief made this statement before the aldermanic Committee on Ordinances, in New Haven. Alderman J. D. Hart, chairman of the committee, said that he, with other members of the committee, had made a personal inspection of many of the places, and that he had unearthed "vice such as could not be spoken of in a public meeting." This has been one of the most severe blows given to moving pictures in New England by public officials for many moons. Let the Managers' Protective Association of Rhode Island be copied by the Connecticut exhibitors, and it's dollars to doughnuts that the eminent guardians of the law will see things through different glasses. Connecticut exhibitors, do your duty—organize!

The Scenic Theater and the Theater Comique, of Revere Beach, will soon be open again for the summer season. The Scenic will give two performances daily, consisting of W. E. Greene's Independent service and vaudeville, with admission at ten cents. The Comique, a smaller house, will play continuously throughout the day and night, charging five cents for Independent films and songs. No vaudeville is to be introduced into the Comique.

Messrs Donovan and Walker have reopened their Casino Theater, Taunton, Mass., after a complete renovation, which has transformed this house into a strictly first-class moving picture theater. The house is brand new from cellar to roof, and is a distinct addition to New England's moving picture theaters.

The World's New England representative will show a photograph of the Casino, together with a story of the house, in a coming issue of The World.

Sheedy's Theater, Brockton, Mass., closed Saturday, April 29, for the season. This house has had a pleasing run of business this past season.

The Colonial Theater, Lowell, Mass., has been closed by John Dovey, after giving it a two month's try-out. This house, seating approximately 850 people, is an excellent theater in every respect; it has waiting-rooms, lavatories, and all other requirements of patrons' comfort. Besides this, the house is well built, and the booth is so situated as to project a good picture. The theater seems cursed with a poor location, on the wrong side of the street and just away from the central portion of the town. Mr Dovey used an expensive service of Licensed pictures and vaudeville for ten cents. Now, Lowell is a mill town, with many operatives with small earning capacity. With such a house as the Colonial, it is just possible that pictures and songs only for five cents—not ten cents—would turn the tide. The saving of the nickel would easily compensate for the extra time it would take to reach the house, and the competition of three houses on the main street charging ten cents would be counterbalanced. With the seating capacity of 850 and no very great expenses, the Colonial would prove itself a winner on a five cent basis always provided the pictures and songs were "as they should be"—of good quality.

The Park Theater, Taunton, Mass., opened recently with moving pictures and vaudeville, and reports business as fair. General Manager Whalen, of the Princess Theater, South Framingham, Mass., reports that the new acquisition is doing a good volume of business. This house was acquired by the Tremont Amusement Company from Warren Church, of Boston. Mr. Whalen is general manager for the corporation.

Mr. William A. Gill has started active building on his new theater to be devoted to moving pictures and vaudeville, at Ansonia, Conn. The house is being constructed of stone and concrete, and will be fireproof in every respect. The opening of the theater will be made about September 15, and it is expected that Mr. Gill will own one of the finest houses in his part of Connecticut.

Mr. J. Fred Lovett, the popular assistant manager of the Scenic Temple, Providence, R. I., has announced his engagement to Miss Annie McGuire. Mr. Lovett is one of the best known men in the moving picture business in his state.

When the Managers' Protective Association of Providence, R. I., held a benefit performance at the Empire Theater, the entire proceeds were given for the planting of trees, etc., in the city, and they again brought most favorable attention to their organization. Such an action as this may have no special direct connection with the motion picture trade, but indirectly, at least, it was a great boost for the Providence exhibitors. It made clear to the press, clergy, and the public that the Association is ready to help Providence to be a model city, and that it has the best interests of the city at heart, and is ready to contribute a good share of money towards that end. The Association is already recognized as an agency for real uplift in Rhode Island, because of its very commendable line of action during its short existence. The Moving Picture World extends its best wishes for the continued success of the Managers' Protective Association of Providence, R. I., and advises exhibitors throughout the country to become acquainted with the ideas and plans of the Association, and to copy its methods.

Boston.

As was hinted in these columns of last week, the Columbia Theater has been acquired by the Marcus Loew interests, which have recently incorporated under the name of the Columbian Amusement Company. Felix Isman, of Philadelphia, and M. Douglas Flattery, of Boston, are prominent members of this corporation. Messrs. Farren and Edwards, who are now operating the house as a burlesque theater, applied for an injunction, but were refused by the judge. The house was sold because of the foreclosure of a mortgage on the property, and this action broke the lease held by Farren and Edwards, although it had several years to run. It is expected that the house will be playing "pop" vaudeville and pictures within a month. The house will be managed by Mr. V. J. Morris, who is at present in charge of the Orpheum, also a Marcus Loew theater.

The Coast correspondent of The World called attention recently to the fact that Los Angeles was a regular Mecca for all sorts of moving picture interests. That brought forth the thought that Boston is probably the largest city in the United States to which no manufacturers of moving pictures have ever been coaxed. It is not too much to state that there is hardly a moving picture manager in Boston who has ever seen a moving picture taken—to say nothing of the fact that none of them has ever set foot inside a moving picture factory. Some of them are wont to say: "I'm going to smoke over to New York some day, just to see the wheels go around in one of the factories." They never seem to do so, as it is difficult for a manager to leave his house for more than a day at a time. Frank Howard, who formerly owned the Licensed exchange in Boston, was able to persuade the Vitagraph Company to send a camera man over to the Hub, to take a film of some local event, a couple of years back. That was the nearest Boston has ever come to having a real live moving picture made in the city. Frank Howard, one of the best liked men in the business in New England, was "mined" in the course of the reel—a parade—and that was a great satisfaction to local exhibitors, as they stated that gave them some representation in the business anyway.

During the later half of the week of April 23-29, Boston was found to be the warmest city in New England, and business at the theaters had a tendency to fall away somewhat. This was the first spell of warm weather encountered this year, and the last days are always hard on the exhibitors. Strange as it may seem, the genuine exhibitors of moving picture theaters report better business in July and August than they do during May and June. These two months are supposed to be the poorest on the calendar for local houses. By the time July has rolled around the people are more accustomed to hot weather and do not keep away from the photoplay so much as they do when the warm days first strike them.

Manager Joe Mack, of the Hub Theater, has increased his vaudeville acts, used in connection with his program of Independent films. The Hub is doing a nice volume of business.

The Beacon and Paritan theaters both exhibited the Vitagraph reel showing the battleship Texas in action. One house stated in its advertisements in the lobby that the reel was shown by especial permission of the manufacturer, the General Film Company, and the United States Government. Three very influential licenses in a small area.

Temple, Texas. Frank Lange has become the sole owner of the Majestic Theater, formerly owned by Sid Stone, and the Temple Theater, formerly owned by Holden and Carter. The two theaters are just opposite to each other on First Street, and both will be managed by Mr. Lange under the names of Majestic No. 1 and Majestic No. 2. No. 1 will show only licensed films and No. 2 Independent with vaudeville.

MELIES IN CALIFORNIA.

San Antonio, Texas, is an interesting Gibson as heavy as a Newfoundland fog hangs over the Lone Star State. The picturesque town with its chaps and its really guns no longer as these to excite the small boy, and the Texan rube sighs for the wilds and smiles of the moving picture actorine. For the Melies Company of all star actors in Star films has cut loose from the Lone Star State and migrated to California, there to revel in the varied scenery and delightful climate which has made screenery adorning the Mecca of the moving picture producer. The Melies Company did well in Texas. The Star films have achieved a high popularity. Mr. Gaston Melies gathered together a strong company, and put over some strong photoplays. Their crowning effort, "The Immortal Alamo," is doubly interesting because it depicts a hitherto unpictured chapter of history, and Gaston Melies himself successfully portrays an important part. This picture will be issued May 25. From now on, the address of the company is Melies Mfg Co., Sulphur Mountain Springs, Ventura County, California.

THE IMP A B C BOOK.

If there is anything new under the sun to exploit the moving picture business you may trust Carl Laemmle, the president of the "Imp" Company, to acquire the first "bunch." This time it is a booklet—not a pamphlet—merely setting forth the excellency of "Imp" pictures—but a pretty thing entitled "The Imp Book." It is the Alpha and Omega in moving pictures in that it is the alphabet of the pictures from "A to "Z." The booklet is printed in colors—an especially designed work—reflecting great credit not only on the author, but the printer. It is all about the "Imps," and one cannot mistake the illu trations. The matter is written in rhyme and the stories are charmingly told, with the initial letter letter prominent. Mr. Laemmle intends it for the "Mother Goose" melodies brought down to date and applied to the screen pictures. It will be furnished to all exhibitors for distribution at a nominal cost, and will make an excellent impression in the home, not only for Imp films but for moving pictures generally.

Carl Laemmle, not to be outdone by his competitors, has gotten out a lobby display that is one of the most attractive things of the sort ever placed on an easel. It is a two-panel frame in which ten stars of the "Imp" stock company appear in counterfeit presentment. The photographs are triumphs of the photographer's skill, 7x9 inches in size, and very handsomely finished. The frame is of oak, of pretty and rich design, the whole combining to make it one that will enhance the beauty of any lobby. The frames are being mailed to exhibitors as fast as they can be finished.

HELP! HELP! HELP!

Little did I dream that my letter which you published in your last issue under the caption "Framing the Screen," would result in a storm of inquiries, but I have received many such, although the issue is not yet a week old, and, as I offered the information for the good of the cause and with no desire for remuneration and it is an effort to answer each inquiry individually, I am obliged to appeal to you for aid, and am preparing an article containing full directions and sketches for making a dull black border, which I will try to have ready for an early issue of The World.

There must be lots of good red blood in your circulation, for the inquiries extend from Canada to Texas, and from Vermont to Nevada, and your readers evince an avid desire for any information which will benefit projection

Truly yours,

Scranton, Pa. GEO. B. ROCKWELL.

MOVING PICTURES ON THE SEA.

Moving pictures are now invading the seas. The steamship Oceana, which journeys to Bermuda and is at present passing out of the possession of the Hamburg-American Line into the hands of the Bermuda-Atlantic Steamship Company, will entertain its passengers during the vacation season with up-to-date moving pictures and illustrated songs. The Moving Picture World pointed out the feasibility of this scheme in an editorial some nine or ten months ago, but the steamship companies were slow in seeing the value of it.

London Letter.

By A. E. Taylor.

The chief event of the past two weeks in London has been the opening of the Scala Theater, which was described in these columns last week. It is considered the handsomest theater in the world, built as it is on the model of the famous Scala of Milan. It now opens as the permanent home of Kinemacolor. With prices ranging from sixpence to half a guinea, whereas pictures have never commanded more than a shilling or so in London, the venture may be said to be an ambitious one, and there are many who think that Mr. Charles Urban is out to lose money. Be that as it may, there is no gainsaying the fact that the entertainment provided is a wonderful one and a veritable triumph for the Kinemacolor process. Those who had made an acquaintance with the process when it enjoyed a season of about two years at the Palace Theater were prepared to see something good, but there is great doubt whether even they anticipated the marvellous strides Kinemacolor has made of late. As each picture succeeded its predecessor the audience went wild with enthusiasm, and the press the next day gave evidence of having gone mad on the process.

What struck the technical experts was the absolute accuracy and naturalness of the colors. Nature may be said to have painted herself with Nature's own brush, the sun. Whether it was in scenes taken at home or abroad, there were the true colors standing out vividly and wonderfully. There is no gainsaying the fact that Kinemacolor is the real thing. The neutral tints so difficult to achieve come out extremely well in this process. The deep grays, the light yellows, the snowy whites, the subtle blacks, and even the brilliance of running waters were depicted as no other process is capable of depicting them. In the coats of the horses and the oxen, the deep tints were faithfully recorded. The velvet red tint of the rose, the glint of the light on the steel, the glare of the sun on the desert sand, and the filmy crest of the storm tossed sea, were thrown upon the screen in quick succession, and above all there was the real, pulsating life in the human bodies, life as we see it, life in every limb. Of the value of Kinemacolor for educational purposes there can be no doubt. It opens up new avenues of pleasure and instruction. In his studios at Hove near Brighton in the summer and at Nice in winter, when English skies are unpropitious for photography, Mr. Charles Urban is ever busy preparing new delights for the picture lover.

In addition to kinemacolor at the Scala, there is an operetta, "Castles in the Air," and this lends additional charm to the entertainment. It is also a noteworthy innovation, as it is the first time that pictures and opera have been associated together in this country. Up to the present the attendance was not been so good as is warranted, but this I consider as due to the charges being somewhat prohibitive. I should think Mr. Chas. Urban would be more likely to make money by knocking the operetta off and running an hour and a half's pictures at a more moderate rate of entrance. The Scala is situated in an out of the way place and if he wants to get people there he will have to reduce the admission.

The Sunday opening question, like the poor, is always with us here. The County Council have recently reviewed the whole matter again and have made some very stringent regulations. The shows are allowed to open only after six o'clock on Sundays, the proceeds have to be given to charity, and no employee is to do more than six continuous days' labor. A little more of this sort of thing and the picture show will be legislated out of existence so far as Sunday shows are concerned.

The Moving Picture Theater Owners' Protective League, now in process of organization in Chicago, met for the first time Tuesday afternoon, April 25th, at the Great Northern Hotel. The new organization, the first of its kind to be formed in this city, is creating a great deal of interest among the movng picture public, and forty-two theater owners appeared at the meeting to sign the roll of membership. Mr. A. A. Anderson was appointed chairman pro tem., with Mr. F. J. Flaherty as secretary, and a committee on constitution and by-laws was appointed.

The object of the organization is chiefly that of protection for exhibitors and a discussion of the subject brought out many good ideas. One of the first important steps to be taken will be that of obtaining, if possible, a correct and fair interpretation of the building laws, and a committee or board of censorship, which will be formed of intelligent, liberal minded policemen, several worthy public spirited citizens and an exhibitor whose familiarity with the business and with the people he does business with, will make him an invaluable asset to such a committee.

The meeting was adjourned after a thorough discussion on the policies and principles of the league, and the next meeting left open to the call of the chairman. The committee on constitution and by-laws expects to be ready to report within a few weeks and, as soon as they are, the next meeting will be called.

Applications for membership from any and all Chicago exhibitors will be welcomed. Address A. A. Anderson, 172 W. Washington Street.

CHICAGO SONG SLIDE EXCHANGE MOVES.

The Chicago Song Slide Exchange, formerly of 79 Dearborn Street, have removed to more comodious quarters in the Powers Building, corner of Wabash Avenue and Monroe Street. The new home of the Chicago Song Slide is complete in every detail, being fitted out with a spacious stock and workroom, three private offices and a comfortable reception room. A piano has been installed in the reception room for the convenience of the patrons in familiarizing themselves with the stock.

Last week we published in our columns some information that came to us relative to some "up to the minute" data on "Daylight Pictures," which was available without cost by writing the Charles L. Knowrt Company, 50 Cortlandt Street, New York City, the bio carbon importers.

The data which some of our readers have reserved say it is excellent information, which tends to broaden the scope of the art and helps to solve the problem now so much discussed.

QUESTIONS ON LAST WEEK'S LESSONS.

Do NOT look at the lesson in preparing your answers. If you do the answers will be of no practical value.

1.—What is a luminous body?

2.—What is a non-luminous body?

3.—By what means does a non-luminous body become visible?

4.—If all bodies reflected light equally and the same, what would be the result?

5.—In what way does the moon become visible?

6.—Hoy may objects on earth, notdirectly in the moonlight, become visible?

7.—Explain why a knot, a crack, a nailhead, a grassblade, a pebble, etc., is distinguishable from its surroundings.

8.—Explain fully why objects are visible from different angles and points of view.

9.—Explain fully why an entire landscape or the entire surface of an object is visible to the eye at one time.

10.—Give your idea of how the body of light is made up.

In the foregoing lessons I have attempted, before particularizing, to give you a comprehensive view or idea of the general action of light as a whole. In speaking of optical matters certain terms are employed, as follows:

Light Ray.—In any homogenous object incident light travels in straight lines from each point of a luminous body, or reflected light from each point of the object. Each one of these lines is called a "Ray" of Light.

Pencil of Rays.—The term "pencil of rays" is used to designate a number of rays of light, when this number is being treated as a whole, and the rays are convergent or divergent.

Divergent Rays are those which are spreading apart, or traveling from a common point in diverging direction.

Convergent or converging rays are those traveling toward a common point.

Parallel Rays or bundle of rays or beam denotes, in first, rays parallel to each other or equi-distant from each other throughout their length; in the second and third a number of parallel rays treated as a whole.

Rectilinear.—In straight lines.

Homogeneous.—A body in which every part is the same. A substance having identical properties at every point of its substance.

Heterogeneous denotes a substance having different properties at different points.

An Optical Medium is a substance capable of transmitting light.

Transparent.—Denotes the property of transmitting light without diffusion, or in straight lines. A substance through which clear vision is had.

Translucent denotes the property of transmitting light, but not in such manner that distinct vision may be had.

Diffusion.—The scattering of light rays in many directions. By diffusion a non-luminous body may, under certain conditions, becomes, to all intents and purposes, as will be hereinafter explained, a source of incident light.

Opaque.—Not capable of transmitting light rays. A substance through which no visible rays pass.

Line.—A measure used in optics equal to one-twelfth of an inch.

Many other terms peculiar to matters optical will be used from time to time, but they will be explained when first used. This is the better way, since many definitions must be illustrated by diagram.

Light rays travel in Straight Lines Only, and reach the eye in the form of a cone. That is to say, between every pinpoint on any visible object and the eye extends a pencil of light rays in the form of a cone, with its apex at the point on the object and its base in the pupil of the eye. In Fig. 4 the whole object becomes comprehensibly visible through the medium of the cone of rays reaching each eye. Also, however, each line of the cone (and millions of other lines, not shown, as well) must be considered as a tiny cone of rays, its apex at some pin-point of the object and its base the diameter of the pupil of the eye. This idea is illustrated in A, Fig. 5, in which the circle represents the pupil of the eye.

If a room be made very dark and a very small hole be punctured in a window shade, if the atmosphere be dusty, or smoky, you may trace the course of the beam of light across the room and it will be perfectly straight. Now let us suppose it to reduce in size to a mere line, in this condition it corresponds to what is meant by a "ray" of light.

Practically the "ray of light" is only a term. It is the most convenient form of expression by which the meaning of certain phenomenon may be conveyed. Light travels in straight lines in any homogeneous, transparent body. In this respect there is no difference at all between incident and reflected light rays. They are identical. It therefore follows that between a given point on the source of light and a given point on the illuminated object, also between that same point on the latter and the eye there must perforce be a straight line of light. This line we call a light ray. As has been shown, from every point on the surface of a source of light, luminous or non-luminous (strictly only a luminous body is a source of light, but I use the source from whence the ray is reflected, also in this example, to make the matter clear), rays eminate, traveling in every direction, unless obstructed by something opaque. A section or number of these rays is called a Pencil of Rays (Fig. 5, in which A is a bundle of rays, B a pencil with convergent, and C one with divergent rays, the arrows showing direction the ray is presumed to travel). A single ray of light could not produce vision, since it could strike only one infinitesmally small spot on the retina of the eye; also it could only come from one equally small point on the object. A pencil of rays, however, would produce vision of an isolated spot on the object, while a combination of many thousands of pencils gives comprehensive vision. Light rays may be divergent (C, Fig. 5) in which the source is at the apex of the cone, convergent (B, Fig. 5) in which the rays pass toward the apex of the cone, or parallel (A, Fig. 5). In fact, A, Fig. 6, is a condition never really found, but where the source of light be distant the cone is so extremely long, and the angle so infinitesimally small, that we call the rays parallel, and consider them to be so. To all intents and purposes they really are so. As the reader will have gathered from the foregoing, while we use the term "ray," we really deal entirely with pencils of rays. The isolation of a single ray would be a physical impossibility. It must be clearly understood that the eye sees only the actual number of rays entering the pupil; and this, compared to the total emanating from any source, incident or reflective, is very, very, very small, since, as has been said, rays proceed in every direction. To illustrate: suppose we enclose a common candle in a glass globe 12 inches in diameter. Now, at any convenient point on the globe's surface trace two circles the diameter of the pupil of the human eye. As the area of the two circles are to the area of the surface of the globe, less a portion of its area at the bottom, so is the percentage of the light we actually see to the total light power of the illuminant. Very likely if, by means of finely ground reflectors, all the light of a common candle could be thrown into our eyes, we should be stricken well nigh blind by its brilliance. It would no doubt be fully equal in effect to gazing open-eyed at the noon-day sun.

Wiring Sketch.—Schenectady, N. Y., writes: "I am a constant reader of the World, especially the Department, though this is my first contribution thereto. Enclosed you will find solution of the wiring puzzle published April 22. I have not drawn the wires exactly the same as the original arrangement, having changed things so that it would be equally correct for D. C. or A. C. I presume the original diagram was designed for A. C. Although the arrangement would work, I do not particularly care for the one switch idea, since the wires, carbons, etc., of both lamp circuits would be alive when either was in use; a feature that would be, to some extent, objectionable, even in a dissolver or double stereopticon, since there are times when it would be desirable to use only one lamp. I believe operators everywhere appreciate your untiring efforts in their behalf, both in the Department and in the time and thought put into the Handbook. Personally, I wish to thank you for the help each has been to me."

I publish your sketch, Schenectady, with the comments thereon, because sketch and comments combined are the best we have yet received on the switch idea. I presume there is no doubt but that the Department has been of benefit to a very great number of operators and managers. Our desire is to make it even more useful in the future than it has been in the past.

Shutter Trouble.—Kansas (name of town and party suppressed by request) writes: "I cannot get along without the 'Moving Picture World' and the Trouble Department. I have a copy of the Handbook and will say it is something every operator and manager should own. I am operating in the best theater in this city, have a Motiograph machine, mirror screen, 250 volts D. C., 118 feet throw and a 12 x 16 picture; use licensed service and have excellent patronage. I am having a little trouble with my shutter. I have it set according to the Enterprise Optical Company's directions, but there is still some travel glare, which streaks the title and everything in the picture. It is barely noticeable, but I am not satisfied. The shutter is set true, but there is a great deal of play in the gears, which I think is where my trouble lies. Will you kindly tell me how to take up the lost motion? The machine is in good condition, having been run only a few months. It has had the best of care. I wish yourself, the 'World' and the Department all possible success."

Many thanks for your kind words, Kansas. As to the shutter, you will find general directions concerning the Motiograph machine on pages 120 to 124 inclusive of the Handbook. I think you have one of the narrow shutters which, while it gives a very large percentage of light, is at the same time somewhat difficult to adjust, due to the fact that it must be set just exactly right. I do not think your trouble lies in the play in the gears; in fact, I am pretty sure it is not there. The Motiograph people furnish two widths of shutter with their machine, and I would suggest you have them send you the wider one. It cuts a little more of the light, but is very much easier to adjust. I cannot give you any clearer instructions for setting the shutter than is contained in the Handbook, pages 111, 112, 113 and 114 inclusive, and in the Motiograph Instruction Book.

A Queer Proposition.—Canton, Ohio, writes: "I am using two machines on 110-220 V. D. C. 3-wire system, one machine on each side of the line. My rheostat is on the positive side of the line on one lamp, the positive wire running to the top carbon, the negative to the bottom, which is of course proper. The other lamp, however, is just the opposite; the positive is on the bottom and the negative on the top. I tested them out with a test lamp. By touching the top carbon of the lamp with the test lamp wire and touching the other end of the test lamp wire to the iron wall which is grounded, the lamp does not light, but when I make the same test on the bottom carbon the lamp lights, thus indicating that to be the positive wire. With the same test on the other lamp the globe burns on the top carbon and does not burn on the bottom. I am enclosing under separate cover stubs of my top and bottom carbons, marked so you can tell which is which. The top carbon, as you will see, burns about 1¼ inches long and is always red, while the bottom carbon instead of burning a little gap across the top burns to a point. The spot on the machine is round, but not as good as I would like to have it. If the connections have anything to do with it, how can I remedy the trouble? I reversed the connections on the lamp, but it is worse than ever. Are two 7½-inch condensers all right for a 12-foot picture at 105 feet? Mr. Addams, in a recent issue of the Department, suggested something being wrong with the circuit breaker I was using. I had it tested and found that it was only a 60-ampere breaker, though the plate and regulating screw were marked 100 amperes. That is, the coil had a carrying capacity of only 60 amperes. I was so disgusted with it when I took it off that I threw it into the corner and only had it tested when Mr. Addams mentioned that there must be something wrong. Please convey to Mr. Addams my thanks for the hint."

The carbon tips show that your top carbon is positive all-right, since it contains the crater. You will do well, however, to use a half-inch solid carbon instead of a ⅝ below, being sure not to get very hard ones. You may test the polarity of a wire by taking a small compass, of any kind, and placing it under one of the wires running to the lamp. Place the compass so that as you stand facing the wire the "N" is directly under the wire and at the left; with the "S" also directly under the wire and to the right; the "W" next to you and the "E" across the wire opposite from you. These letters, of course, refer to the points of the compass. Now, light the lamp and if the compass needle swings toward "W" the current flows towards your left hand. If that is towards the lamp, then it is the positive wire. If it is towards the power house or away from the lamp, it is the negative wire. If, on the other hand, the compass swings towards "E," then the current will be flowing to the right and the opposite will be the case. But, aside from all this, if there were anything wrong with your connection—that is to say, if your lamp is connected upside down—reversing the wires would cure the trouble. The reason that your test lamp lights only on the two outside wires is that, though the neutral is both positive and negative—positive to an outside wire and negative to the other, it is always grounded at or near the power house. Yes, two 7½ condensers are all right on your picture.

Anchor for Machine Table.—A. E. Kirk, Galveston, Tex., writes: "Let me contribute to the Trouble Department a method for steadying the machine so it will be solid as a rock. The arrangement described was installed by me in one of our local houses, as a last resort. It has been giving excellent results.

While a soap box might do to set a stereopticon on, such make-shifts are useless for moving picture machines. Even the regular telescopic leg tables ordinarily furnished with the machines are wholly unsuitable for the proper support of the machine, since the slightest movement is greatly magnified on the screen. The method ordinarily adopted for steadying the table is by some form of bracing. While these are probably the best make-shift at hand, they are a long ways from perfect and frequent adjustment is necessary. Aside from this, they put a great strain on the table, so much in fact as to actually bend it enough to throw the machine head out of line with the lamp house. The sketch shows an anchor which will hold the machine perfectly steady. The greatest unsteadiness is that caused by side vibration of the machine, that is to say, the swaying from side to side. It is largely to overcome this that the method was designed. The pipe "A" is cut long enough to fit loosely between floor and ceiling of the operating room. Be afraid not be smaller than 1 inch and need not be larger than 1¼ inch. Must be threaded on both ends to accommodate two floor flanges, as shown, which latter should be screwed on as far as they will go. Stand the pipe up near the baseboard of the machine, as shown. Screw the bottom flange to the floor, then by unscrewing the pipe or top flange a little way the whole thing can be made to fit rigidly between the floor and ceiling. When adjusted right—that is, tight—fasten the top flange to the ceiling by means of screws. Now, all that remains is to make a sort of clamp piece, as shown at "B," which will slide up or down on the pipe stand to a point in line with the machine table, to which it is then made fast by means of screws, being afterwards clamped rigidly to the pipe by means of the loop "B" and bolt. The front end of the table can then be braced in any one of a number of ways, because of its nearness to the solid wall of the booth. A piece of strap iron about ¼ inch thick by 1 inch wide bent in a "Z" shape, as shown, is about effective.

We are certainly indebted to you, Neighbor Kirk, for the excellent drawing and the thoroughly practical idea advanced. It needs but a glance to show that the standard you have devised will deliver the goods, without being, to any serious extent, in the way of the operator. It is the best thing for the purpose I have seen to date, though there are a few operating rooms in which it probably could not be made available. We shall be glad to have a word from you concerning the photo-play situation in Galveston, the city of the great sea wall.

Operating Room Photo.—Mr. S. A. Acri, Marietta, Pa., writes: "Enclosed and photo of our booth, which is none of the best. It shows plainly, however, how the motor is connected with the flywheel, also incandescent lights cut in so as to form a speed regulating rheostat. We have no trouble in regulating speed, as the top globe is a 4 c. p., the next an 8 c. p. and the third a 10 c. p. and the fourth a 16 c. p. Please note the old stand-by paper I am holding in my hands—the 'Moving Picture World'; also the little mirror fastened to the lamp house door just back of the peephole. It reflects the carbons so that the crater can be seen from almost any place in the booth. This little arrangement I have used for about two years. Another little device is the stove pipe arrangement, which can be slid back and forth so as to cut out the entire spot from the operator's eyes, giving him a better chance to govern his light by reason of having a clearer view of the screen."

I publish the photo, Neighbor Acri, for the reason that operating room pictures are of interest. I had to do some pretty close looking to find that rheostat in the photo. I have, however, outlined the globes so that they show more plainly.

Fire Shutter Trouble.—Nova Scotia (name of town and party suppressed by request) writes: "Enclosed find $1.50 for the Handbook. I certainly enjoy the Department and have derived much benefit from it. Can you tell me how many K. W. it would take to operate an Exhibition Model and ten 16 c. p. lamps on 110 volts, 60 cycle A. C. circuit, three hours? Have trouble with the automatic shutter on the above machine; will not come up unless the crank is moved at very high speed and when adjusted so it will come up at normal speed, it will not close when the handle is stopped."

In order to answer your K. W. question intelligently, I would have to know how many amperes of current you propose using, or if you want me to answer it from my own viewpoint as to the amount of current used on a given size picture, then tell me what size picture you are projecting. Until you do this I could not give any kind of an intelligent answer. As to the automatic shutter, I don't know exactly what you have been doing. There is no adjustment possible with the governor you name. If you put oil on it it won't raise. It opens by reason of a small piece of felt in the side of one of the swinging arms rubbing on the casing. If this felt is worn out send to the Edison folks and get another. If the friction surface (where the felt rubs) gets too dry and rough the governor will stick open. The remedy is to lubricate by putting a small quantity of plumbago (graphite) inside the governor, never lubricate an Edison fire shutter governor with oil—use graphite instead.

New Tension Equalizer.—Milwaukee, Wis., writes: "I am in Chicago quite frequently and always take occasion to call on the Western office of the 'World'; it is a good place to frequent. I bought one of your Handbooks there in February. I have been visiting the moving picture theaters of Chicago and must say that Milwaukee has them all beaten, in every way, in the matter of good projection. While in the Windy City recently I dropped in at the Liberty Theater on Halstead Street, and must say that the odor was something terrible and the darkness equally as bad. I wonder the health authorities do not get after them. The best projection I have viewed anywhere is in the Unique Theater, of Milwaukee, but the place is too small and one has to frequently wait to get a seat. The American and Vaudette also put up very fine shows. These latter are 5 cent houses and seem to hold their own right beside the 10 cent places (haven't you got that reversed, Milwaukee?—Ed.), notwithstanding their cheaper class also. I have seen moving picture performances in the larger cities in the United States, including your own New York City and Boston, but Milwaukee, as I said, has them all backed off the map on projection and we hope to maintain that record. Your article on good projection in April 8th number hits the nail on the head all right, all right, and for one think your high-class idea ought to be tried out, and while I am not now in the exhibition end of the business, I have a notion to try it. I have my own take-up tension equalizer nearly ready for the patent agent and will send you a photo of it before long. It is to be attached to the outside (left) take-up mechanism and will probably cost something like $25 or $30. For stationary stands, however, the expense would be justified. For simplicity there is nothing to come up to the usual friction device, but as there are clamorings for tension equalizer, I have it—and one that holds the film absolutely at one steady strain. The idea is that the rollers, moved outward by the increased size of the reel, raise the friction gears along a disc on the reel shaft, which keeps the uniform circumferential speed the same as the film travels through the machine. It is positive in its action. Whether it will take with the exhibitors and operators in general remains to be seen. However, I am going to venture and if it takes at all I will give some smart talker a big commission to sell the right."

I am very glad, indeed, Friend Griggs, to know that projection in Milwaukee is on such a high plane and I trust that it may be thus maintained, and even improved. As to the equalizer, we shall be glad, indeed, to look it over as soon as it is ready. There is not a "crying" need for such a device, but a howling need for it; though, as you say, if it is a costly one that it will probably require considerable effort to successfully introduce it. The friction take-up is doing thousands of dollars' worth of damage to film every day, but nobody seems to care much one way or the other how badly films become injured. It is a strange thing to me that film exchanges do not get busy on this proposition and take some steps or some intelligent action tending to protect their own property. But up to date the apathy as regards film injury seems to be universal. Exchanges could well afford to offer houses using a really effective take-up tension equalizer a service price of a dollar or two a week less than houses not thus equipped. They would be gainers by so doing.

Arc Rectifier.—East St. Louis, Ill., writes: "Enclosed find $1.50 for the Handbook. I also wish some information about the mercury arc rectifier. We are using A. C. Our machine is a Standard and my old operator had very little trouble getting light through the different reels, though the new one seems to have some difficulty. Have been told that with D. C. supplied by the mercury arc rectifier we would have no difficulty at all with the light, if the operator understood anything at all about the moving picture machine. I know nothing, or very little, about electricity or moving picture machines, but hope to learn. So many people have so many different opinions about the different things pertaining to the moving picture and how to get the best results, that I appeal to you, feeling that I will get an unbiased opinion. Kindly reply by mail instead of through the Department."

Much as I would like to accommodate, I would not have time to do anything else if I made personal replies to all those requesting them. The rectifier is a thoroughly practical machine and will unquestionably deliver the goods if it has anything like intelligent handling. The machine is perfectly automatic in operation, however, and I think your operator would have no difficulty with it. There is no question but what you will get a very much better light from rectified current than you can with A. C. and at the same time save a very considerable proportion of your light bill. This by reason of the fact that in order to secure equal illumination with A. C. you will be obliged to use a much heavier amperage than is necessary with D. C. Until such time as a practical arc voltage motor-generator set is devised to rectify A. C., I regard the mercury arc rectifier as the best device for the purpose on the market. One reason why there are so many different opinions is that the average exhibitor's or operator's knowledge is largely confined to his own personal experiences, and the advice of a few friends equally limited in experience.

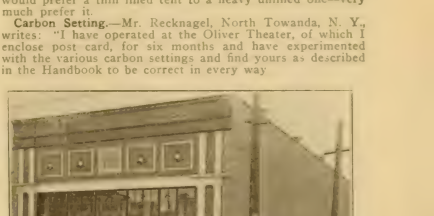
Richmond Again.—Richmond, Va., writes: "In your answer to my queries (p. 951, April 29th issue), you ask certain questions. I know I am using 235 volts because that is the standard pressure all over the city. I believe Richmond is one of the very few cities in this country that uses high voltage. We have the three-wire system in the house. I have used an ammeter and find I was mistaken that instead of 40 amperes I am really pulling 30, though when the arc is first sprung it pulls 40, dropping back, however, to 30. I am using Lulin rheostats and there is about 45 feet distance between the rheostats and the machine, the former being in the basement. I believe I lose a great deal of current in the circuit to and from the basement. If I use anything less than a 35 ampere fuse it will blow every time. The current is D. C. I throw a picture 32 feet from the top of picture and 21 feet wide. I will send for the Handbook this week."

If you are only pulling 30 amperes with that size picture it should by no manner of means be brilliant or even what could be classed as very good. There is no reason why you should have any appreciable loss in the basement circuit if it be No. 6 wire. If it is smaller than No. 6 tear it out and put in No. 6, and then boost your amperage up to 40 or 45. Possibly a part of your trouble lies in the carbon setting. On pages 86 to 91 inclusive of the Handbook you will find explicit directions, accompanied by illustrations, showing the proper set of carbons for both A. C. and D. C. Be sure that the inside of your carbon holders are clean, so that the carbon makes good electrical contact with the holder and that the wires inside of the holder are not burned. I do not understand exactly what you mean by "I throw a picture 32 feet from the top of picture." If you mean your throw is 32 feet and you are projecting a picture 21 feet wide, you are very likely to have difficulty in getting sharp definition or "focus," since good lenses of that exceedingly short focal length are hard to get. You say you are using 235 volt pressure on a three-wire system. I must repeat the assertion that this is exceedingly unusual. If you are taking from one side, that would indicate a total line pressure between the two outside wires of 470 volts. If you are connected to the two outside wires why not cut in on the neutral and one outside and thus half the voltage, cutting down resistance and consequently eliminating much waste?

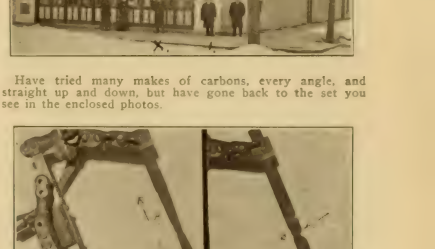
Black-Top Wanted. Mr. Oliver Lease, 618 Salem Avenue, York, Pa., writes: "Will you please tell me where I can get a moving picture tent? Also whether chairs could be rented? If so, where? Does it make any difference which wire of the circuit the rheostat is connected on? Must a tent be lined to make it dark enough for daylight work?"

It makes no difference which wire the rheostat is connected on. I very much doubt your ability to rent chairs for a traveling show. Even if you could you would have to deposit their value or give ample security. I would not recommend renting chairs under those conditions. As to tents write to M. R. Kunkely, 163 South Street, New York City, mentioning this paper if you will. Very likely, however, by advertising in the World's Classified columns you will receive offers of tents from exhibitors who have them for sale. Yes, it is much better that a black top should be used. Usually they have a false canopy or ceiling of thin black cloth a foot or two from the top, though different manufacturers have different schemes as regards these details. I might add that unless you get a very heavy duck you will find much light will come in unless it is lined. Personally I would prefer a thin lined tent to a heavy unlined one—very much prefer it.

Carbon Setting.—Mr. Recknagel, North Towanda, N. Y., writes: "I have operated at the Oliver Theater, of which I enclose post card, for six months and have experimented with the various carbon settings and find yours as described in the Handbook to be correct in every way



Have tried many makes of carbons, every angle, and straight up and down, but have gone back to the set you see in the enclosed photos.



The enclosed photos show (1) carbons after a run of two weeks without cutting off cable ends or cleaning the carbon holders. That is why the carbons "needle." Many complain that the needling is due to poor carbons, but you see it is only burned cable and dirty carbon holders, since photograph No. 2 shows the carbons after cleaning the lamp house, cutting cable off about four inches and cleaning the inside of the carbon holders with a file. The carbon set shown gives perfect light and entire satisfaction. Our town has about 8,000 population. The Oliver Theater was erected last summer at a cost of about $16,000. Will write you again next Sunday. "X" in the photo is your humble servant and "I" is the projector. The crosses on windows show location of operating booth.

I received sketch of the shutter arrangement. Friend Recknagel, but did not publish it this week because, while I see now how you have it connected, I do not yet understand the shutter itself. Kindly cut a paper pattern of the shutter and forward same to me. As you have it in the sketch the shutter blade is only 11 inches wide, of course, an impossibility. As to the carbon needling, if you are correct in that you have put your finger on the center as I had always attributed needling to bad carbon holders. Of course, it is quite true that poor contact with the carbon holders would superinduce excessive heating in the carbons, thus tending to cause needling. But I do not agree with you that the burned cables could have any possible effect in that direction, since they would simply tend to reduce the amperage. You are absolutely correct in amputating the cable every two weeks, or oftener if you are using heavier current. When I use two sets of alternating, I usually cut them off twice a week, or just as soon as it begins to show burn. I will publish the shutter diagram just as soon as you send me the paper pattern of the shutter, so I can properly explain the thing. The thanks of myself and the readers of the Department are yours, Friend Recknagel, for your excellent letters and ideas.

Shocking.—New York City writes: "Will you kindly answer the following in the Department? (1) When I am grounded and touch the lamp house I get a shock, yet when I test same with a test lamp the lamp does not light. (2) I use an old Powers No. 5 machine; picture jumps, but when I hold top loop as it passes the gate roller the picture is steady. (3) When I raise a small bottom loop it is all right, but when I make a large one the loop runs out. What is the reason?"

(1) The probability is, New York, that your lamp house is grounded by reason of a little carbon dust across the insulation. This would be sufficient to give you a sharp shock, but might not be enough to light a test lamp. If that isn't the trouble, then it is some other slight ground, incapable of carrying sufficient current to light a test lamp. (2) Evidently your tension springs are too loose. And it is quite possible that your intermittent movement is loose also; that is to say, the star is not tight enough against the cam. From what you say I believe it is the combination of both. Put your screwdriver under the tension springs and carefully bow them out by rubbing the screwdriver up and down, at the same time pulling out on the spring, though not hard. (3) Couldn't tell without looking at the machine. The probability is the stripper blade is not set square, thus throwing the lower loop out of line with the take-up sprocket.

Half Size Projection Lenses.—Ohio (name of town and party suppressed by request) writes: "I see you are advising the use of half size projection lenses in moving picture projection and I thoroughly agree with you. They give a far better picture than do the quarter size on a long throw. My manager was advised to buy a half size projection lens and agreed to have two sent on trial. After I had run half a reel with one of them he remarked: 'Well, what do you think of that for a picture?' As a user of the half size moving picture projection lenses, I would certainly recommend them to anyone who wants high class projection. I do not know whether they are made by more than one manufacturer or not, but mine are Gundlach. There is a Union operator in this town working for $8 a week. My own salary is $21 and I am not a Union operator either."

You must not judge Unions by the mere fact that one individual is working for such low salary as that. I would, however, say that a Union card is not always evidence that its holder is a real Union man. I have known many holders of Union cards whose unionism was about as strong as a badly decayed cobweb. Unionism, however, is the thing. The exhibitors, the bankers, the judges, attorneys, merchants, architects, engineers, and even the preachers, have their Unions. They do not usually call them "Unions"; they are generally dubbed "Association" or something of that kind, which sounds more aristocratic, but, boiled down, it is nothing more or less than a Union, devised wholly and entirely to serve precisely the same end served by the labor Union, namely, to protect the professional or craft interests of its members. Organization is the order of the day and the wise man will become a member of his craft organization, since it is the only effective protection he can have. As to half size lenses, it has just occurred to me that the half size lens will largely obviate the difficulty experienced in securing focus all over the picture where a large size lens drop or where the machine sets to one side of the screen. To those projecting downward on a heavy pitch and to those whose machines set to one side of the house, I would strongly recommend the installation of the half size lens. I haven't tried this out, but I am very confident I am right in assuming that the half size lens will clear up the focus, which is almost always bad on some part of the picture under those conditions. On long throws there is another reason for using the half size, which I will deal with soon. I haven't room in this week's issue.

Herbst Process.—Mr. John Strong, Springfield, O., writes: "I note (page 956, April 29th issue) you ask me to describe the Herbst daylight attachment, so I will do my best. I enclose a couple of sketches which will explain the matter, I think. You note that just outside the screen space occupied by the picture is a band of light, the shadow on which the picture is projected being thrown by a piece of sheet iron placed in the stereo picture opening. The picture itself is thrown inside of the shadow caused by the central piece of iron. You can secure more information from Mr. Pat Casey, New York, if you wish."

We are obliged to you, Neighbor Strong, for the description. I wish to correct one error, however. You cannot project a shadow. Such a thing is a physical or optical impossibility. You can, however, project a band of light around a spot on the curtain, thus producing the effect of a shadow by contrast. The shadow itself merely means that there is no light from the stereopticon being thrown on that particular portion of the curtain. I have been invited by Mr. Casey to view the performance of the Herbst machine and intend doing so next week, after which I shall probably give the results of my observation.

Some Pointers.—Mr. R. L. Strong, Tampa, Fla., writes: "I believe you will be fair even to one who dares takes issue with you on a few points in operating. I believe I am justified in saying that I do not take all that is written on operating for granted, especially when it concerns A. C. for the very simple reason that A. C. troubles are too numerous to be dealt with according to any one set of rules. A great many operators will dispute me when I say I am trimming my lamp, or rather, I set my carbons the same as I would for D. C., but set the top carbon back ¼ inch from the center line of the lower one. I am getting results, too, results which give me a perfect white field. To those having a ghost, I would say there are three causes, viz.: condensers, condensed light projection, and carbon trimming. To remove a ghost, if the throw be more than 40 feet, use one 6½ and one 7½, the latter in front. From aperture to center of condenser housing, the distance should not be less than 14½ inches. Having set the lamp house thus, get busy and find a suitable lamp trim. The trim I am using as above set forth will prove satisfactory in nine cases out of ten, and your ghost will be a dead one. I am always after a better light and that is why I offer the results of my experiments. If you find you have double rings at the side of the spot, turn (not change) your condensers around until the spot becomes a perfect circle. I was formerly a member of the Chicago Local Union No. 144, I. A. T. S. E."

My dear boy, talking about "daring" to take issue with the editor of the Department is unnecessary. That is exactly what I want you to do, if you think I am wrong. Discussion is precisely what the Department is for and there is no "dare" to it. Your set is exactly what I have always recommended, except I think you will find you have not got your top carbon as much as ¼ inch behind the lower one. One-eighth of an inch would be more like it. As to the ghost matter, I pass that on our readers without comment.

Refillable Fuse Tubes.—Massillon, O., writes: "I enclose you herewith circular of the Daune refillable fuse shell and would like your opinion of same. The only improvement over the ones shown on page 27 of your Handbook, is that it has the screw ends and can readily be refilled. Is it not a good thing? What objection could anyone have to same? Why should not the fire underwriters approve same?"

I cannot recommend the use of this use, the trouble being that there would always be the liability for overloading; that is to say, using a heavier fuse than the cartridge barrel is designed for. That, I presume, is the reason it is not approved by the Board of Fire Underwriters.

Light on the Shutter.—Mr. C. B. Burkhardt, Homer, Ill., writes: "In the last issue, under the heading 'Much Work, Little Pay,' you say there should not be a circle of light show on the outside shutter; only the outline of the aperture. The circle shows very plainly on my shutter. What is wrong? Attached find $1 as a help on the light question. When God created the earth he said, 'Let there be light,' so I take it to be rather a good thing to know more about."

In an reply to the article named perhaps was not explicit enough. The surface of a metal shutter, of course, reflects some light and the outline of the aperture will, therefore, be surrounded by a sort of halo of light, from 2 to 3 inches in diameter. There should not, however, be a distinct circle the size of the lens, and if there is it would indicate loss of light through some fault in the lens. I could not say what. I think, however, that where such a condition is present the definition of the picture will be found to be bad. If there is a distinct circle on the shutter the size of the lens or approximately the size of the lens, with a sharp defined circular rim, please advise me and I will look further into the matter. Your dollar will be held until I see if there is sufficient response to make the answering of questions by mail feasible. If there is not, the dollar will be returned. I shall know, I presume, and not to exceed two weeks.

Position Refused.—Philadelphia, Pa., writes: "This is to let you know I still wish a position. I thank you for giving my name to Montgomery, but I would rather not go so far South. Would also like to have a Sunday off, as I have been working seven days a week for three years."

Well, Philadelphia, I shall have to give you a jacking up, as a warning to others. When operators write asking me to secure them positions they should place all the limitations they have in mind in their letter. In this case, I have not only taken the trouble to send your name to an employer, but he has been put to the trouble of corresponding with you and all with no result. In future, those asking me to place them must note what part of the country they want to go or do not want to go to, else I shall expect them to take positions offered, provided the salary is a fair one. That is only fair to me and to the employers to whom I give the names.

Isolated Light Plant.—Conneaut, O., writes: "You ask what kind of generating plant we use. (Page 951, April 29th issue.) It consists of a Standard dynamo made by the Robbins & Myers Company, Springfield, O., Comp. wd. 110 volts, 44 amperes, 5 K. W., 1100 R. P. M., and is driven by a 10 h.p. Fowler gas engine, Model 100, made by the Fowler Company, of Oil City, Pa., and belted to the dynamo by proper size pulleys. For ignition we use a K. W. high-tension magneto made by the K. W. Ignition Company, Cleveland, O., which has batteries and coils beaten a mile. In regard to your answer to my letter, you say the transformer (meaning the so-called economizer, not the service transformer on the pole) might have been wound for a different voltage. No, the voltage is 110 and 133 cycle and the economizer was so marked. We are now using, in that same house (which, by the way, is owned by the company that I am with), a Sterling economizer which, with proper handling, delivers current at the nearly equal to D. C. Our switches, fuses and wires are heavy enough to carry 75 amperes and we use from 35 to 70 amperes, according to the density of the film. I am not trying to sell these coils nor do I get a rake-off for saying this, but when an article delivers the goods it will get my earnest approval. I enclose a rough sketch of Mr. L. L. Carr's puzzle. I do not suppose it is anywhere near correct, but I am willing to learn. I wish yourself and the World all kinds of success."

We are indebted to you for the excellent description of the light plant, which I understand is giving excellent service. The answer to the wiring diagram is correct. Like yourself, I thoroughly believe in recommending articles which deliver the goods.

Satin Curtain a Failure.—Mr. Chas. Lyndon, Malvern, Ia., writes: "I wish to add my thanks to those of others for your most valuable work in the Handbook. It is worth its weight in gold. In one of the back numbers of the 'World' I note a question regarding the use of white satin curtains for projection. I have tried same and found them to be one great big failure. There seems to be a haze or film in front of the picture which makes the picture indistinct. I write this to prevent others from making the same expensive mistake I did. I am a traveling operator and have an Edengraph machine. We stay a week in each town and, since I have had my Edengraph, have yet to find any house in which projection was as good as my own. Have tried two of the gas generating outfits advertised and have not find them as efficient as compressed gas; neither is the compressed gas as expensive. This for the benefit of those who have been making inquiries. Wish also to ask if you have any record of getting good projection under the following conditions: throw, 64 feet; picture, 10x14; 4-inch lens; 220-volt D. C.; 25 to 30 amperes and only one condenser. I succeeded in getting an excellent picture with only one condensing lens. I had a new arc lamp that could not be brought close enough to the condenser to get a large enough spot with two condenser lenses."

Your remarks, Friend Lyndon, are appreciated and passed on to our readers. The general report is, however, that generated gas is considerably cheaper than compressed gas and I think myself you are mistaken in that particular, when you come to count the return shipment of the tanks and everything. A good picture could be had with one condenser, but there is a tremendous loss of light, due to the lamp being so far from the lens.

Two Things at Once.—Jersey City writes: "I note that Fergus Falls, Minn., says an operator cannot do two or three things at one time and do justice to each. I do not wish to say that Fergus Falls is wrong, but at the same time I have run in places where I had to thread my machine while running the song slide, and rewind one reel while running the other. I did this and suited the boss. I was getting $18 per. Would like to get more information concerning daylight pictures."

The editor of this department fully agrees with Fergus Falls, Jersey City. An operator, as I have already pointed out, cannot do two or three things at once and do each one very well. That you "suited the boss" does not prove anything, since a great many nickelodeon managers are "suited" as long as the picture does not climb clear off the screen. As to daylight pictures, I had the pleasure of witnessing the most utterly astonishing performance last Thursday night at midnight that has fallen to my lot since I began studying projection. I am not at liberty to say whose this is or where it is, at this time, though I believe it will soon be on the market. But I saw what I consider the most beautiful and the best picture I ever looked at projected with less than 30 amperes of current (30 amperes fuses, for I examined them and also looked at the spot) in a theater in which three hundred (300) 16 c. p. incandescent white lights were burning, without any shading whatever. I could sit down in any portion of the house and read my newspaper with the utmost comfort. I was simply amazed at the result. I would not have believed it possible of accomplishment; and seemingly it contradicts and overturns all the laws of projection. The light from practically every one of these 300 globes struck the curtain, though it is true that the greater portion of the globes were lightly frosted. I shall have more to say about this performance as soon as I am at liberty to give more definite information.

Putting in Cam Wheel.—New York City asks: "Please explain how to put in a Powers 5 pin wheel."

With a small punch remove the pin which holds small bevel gear on right (shutter driving gear) to shaft, also pin holding cam wheel (pin wheel you call it). You may then slip the flywheel shaft out, removing the pin wheel. Slip the shaft back into place, through the new cam wheel, and see if the pin hole comes right when the cam wheel is snug against the star (the star may be shifted sidewise slightly by moving the eccentric bushings endwise). If not, mark proper position of wheel on shaft, remove and drill new pin hole.

Notice.—All half-tone cuts used in this department will be sent, postage free, to those desiring them at a price of ten cents per square inch. The minimum price for any cut being $1.00.

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS,
Local 186, I. A. T. S. E. (Springfield, Mass.)
Wage Schedule of 1910 and 1911.

Section 1. All houses with seating capacity of 300 or less, said house running ten hours and using two operators, first operator to receive $20, second operator to receive $15; the working time of two operators to be six and five hours, the extra hour to be used in getting show ready and attend to cleaning of machines and booth. This work to alternate between the two men. All houses running ten hours using two operators, with a seating capacity of over 300, said operators, first operator to receive $20, second operator to receive $18.

Section 2. All houses playing two a day, with seating capacity of 300 or less, working time in said house not to be over eight hours; all houses with over 300 seating capacity, working time of said house not to be over seven hours; operator to receive $20 a week.

Section 3. All houses outside of Springfield, in smaller towns playing two a day, using one operator, operator to receive $18 a week.

Section 4. All houses in small towns playing only evenings and Saturday and holiday matinees, operator shall receive $16 a week.

Section 5. All special and Sunday performances to be $5, six hours to constitute working time. All over six hours, 75 cents an hour. All Sunday night performances of three hours or less, $3.

Section 6. All extra weekly hour work, 50 cents an hour. Six days to constitute a week's work.

Section 7. It is mutually agreed between the managers of all theaters and members of Local 186, M. P. M. O., that in case of a desired change by either party one week's notice is to be given, unless for incompetency, which would mean immediate discharge.

SCALE OF WAGES OF LOCAL 35, NEW YORK CITY.

At a regular stated meeting of Auxiliary Local 35 I. A. T. S. E., the following schedule was adopted as the scale to be paid moving picture machine operators, to take effect June 15, 1909:

Two man or double shift, no less than $18 per week.
One man or single shift, afternoon and evening, no less than $21 per week.
Open air or evening only, no less than $18 per week.
Road show men, no less than $21 per week.
This is the official scale and all union operators are requested to take notice and act accordingly.

Attest:
W. S. LANG, Pres. JOHN S. CLARK, Cor. Sec.,
105 E. 14th Street, New York City.

LICENSED.

"The Twin Towers" (Edison).—This is a story of the French Revolution. Its feature is the plank with which a woman outwits three ruffians till help comes. When the woman throws one of the men to the ground from the plank upon which he is crossing from one of the twin towers to the other, the audience applauded. And at the end, when she and her husband overcome the other two and escape there was more applause. It is a picture which is interesting because of the apparent plausibility of the story and the spirit of contest which characterizes it. It was very poorly acted.

"The Romance of a Valet" (Gaumont).—A comedy in facial expression mostly, giving the adventures of a valet who fell in love with the maid across the court. He and this maid are both comedians, so we have this good film. When his master leaves, he goes across to call and finds that the big butler is the maid's husband. He gets a rough reception and crawls back, wanting to die. Now his master had left a bottle of very choice wine which he warned the valet was deadly poison. The valet can't bear to blow out his brains, so takes this poison and has a good time dying. When the master wakes him he says, "I am waiting for death." It is a good film.

"Old Folks" (Gaumont).—A comedy representing Jimmie and Toto as caring for two old people. They adroitly bring the old people together, one paralyzed and the other blind. They are rewarded by getting a chance to play. The comedy has no particular strength, but may be considered as a species of lightener for a heavy program. Its best quality is the homely interest and tenderness; it is rich in these.

"A Klondike Steal" (Vitagraph).—This tale of adventure shows three girls who went to the Klondike to stake a gold claim left them by their father. There is one exciting incident when their guides steal their maps and another when the party, which now consists of two young miners, discover the guides staking the claim. There are two weddings, leaving one girl forlorn, which must have been an oversight for it is reported that in the Northwest "wimen is skairs." The little Eskimo is an additon to the picture and the scenery is very intereating. The snow looks cold enough and the girls look helpless enough after the loss of their map to arouse the sympathies of any man. But it all ends well and the audience thoroughly enjoys this love story among the Klondike snows, with a search for gold as the moving impulse.

"The Two Mothers" (Essanay).—This story is as humanely improbable as a play can be, nearly. It was impossible to act it, mostly, but not wholly. A very improbable board of secret service men find a very probable counterfeit and this is followed by a very improbable raid, in which one of the criminals, in attempting to escape, is shot. This man makes his way to his home and we see a very amateurist death scene with a "hats off all" kind of ending. We then see the counterfeiter's wife with her baby and see her make up her mind to kill the detective. We have seen the young lady who takes this part do clever work, but who could have carried this scene? We see her outside, at the reception where she manages to kill the detective. The detective's wife then makes a highly improbable visit to the counterfeiter's wife and, because both have children, they "understand," forgive and are best friends. Of course all this awakens the human emotions somewhat, but it is a very amateurist piece of work.

"The Two Heroes" (Edison).—In this delightful little comedy of the usual rural play order there are two veterans. The jealous rivalry between them begins on the field of Bull Run, and it lasts through years, but is finally settled, much to the happiness of their children. Their son and daughter, hopeless of reconciling them, eloped, for the fathers objected to a wedding. Fate intervenes in time so that the bride and groom come home at once for the parental blessing of both fathers now fast friends. The characterization in this film is commendable.

"A Night and a Day" (Kalem).—Wife's plan to bring her husband to terms did not work, because his mother interfered. And wife was severely punished for her attempt to make it unpleasant for him. The picture is unusual in offering the other side of the story, seldom seen or made plain.

"Rival Brothers' Patriotism" (Pathe).—Here we have another war story, with love and jealousy intermixed. There is a letter that goes wrong and a fight in a pass in which one brother loses his life, and is decorated after death. The soldiers in this film are much better than usual in moving pictures. The only trouble with the picture is that its kind is too common.

"The Latest Edict of Francis II" (Urban).—A series of scenes of life at the French court during the time of Catherine de Medici. Poor Catherine is fair game to all who write. She was bad enough, but she was no Messaline. The story is based upon a love affair, with a man nearly executed. The tinted settings and costumes, with the reproduction of the life of that time, are the important features. The audience observes with the closest attention the pictures which are presented, including the scenes in court, the throne room and elsewhere about the palace. The situations are somewhat complicated, but the elegant costumes and the bearing of the actors are sufficient to overcome any slight difficulty of that sort. It is, indeed, an unusually interesting film.

"Scenes in Colombo, Ceylon" (Urban).—A picture of life in a little known land. It is well made and the scenes selected are interpretative of the country. The photographer chose his view points and his scenes with skill, and there is much in the movements of the people and other features to interest.

"Picciola" (Vitagraph).—In this story a little plant springs up between the stones in a prison yard. It is tenderly cared for by de Charney, a nobleman who is a political prisoner. When he is told all a tea made from its leaves cured him. A petition to Napoleon regarding the plant brought the emperor, in person, directing that the plant be spared, and ultimately securing for this prisoner and one other a pardon. A tender love story is interwoven, supplying heart interest and ending in the girl, a daughter of one of the prisoners, marrying de Charney. The details are worked out with care, and the sentiment expressed is unusually tender. The story grips from beginning to end.

"A Priestess of Carthage" (Gaumont).—This picture should take front rank with the best that has been done by the Gaumonts. The leading role is played by Mlle. Gravier, as the priestess and she carried her part well nigh to perfection. Indeed, it is difficult to conceive how it could have been done better. The first act shows the temple of the sun and moon and the photography is really remarkable. The costumes, for example, have a delicate sheen and seem much like real goods.

Even the color of jewels in the women's hair are perfectly reproduced. It would be impossible to improve upon it. The second scene shows Arlizath's palace and the tent of Gersaken, the Barbarian. The third scene is the Square of Khamon and the Barbarian camp at night, while the last two scenes are in the Temple of Tanit and the interior of the House of Eschmon. The story is laid in Carthage about 150 years B. C. and the action comes in the endeavor to get a moon stone from the turban of Gersaken, the possession of which will bring success to the Carthaginian arms. The priestess, Arizath, undertakes to do this and succeeds, but she and Gersaken fall in love and the closing scene is a wedding. Only one touch of humor pervades the picture, when Gersaken pursues Moammo, who steals the moon stone. The audience does not see the stroke of the sword, but Gersaken brings in a severed head, which is shown to the audience and placed in a bag made of skins. The murdered man is a rejected suitor of the priestess. It is a striking scene when she clears the blood from the sword over the altar fire. In every sense, costuming, acting, staging and photography, this film can scarcely be surpassed. It is one of the best the company has ever released. Everyone having to do with its production has performed his or her part with skill and discretion.

"The Foster Father" (Pathe).—Here is a picture, by the American Company, with its scenes laid in the mining country, and filled with interesting features. A thief, to escape arrest, assumes that a little child, whose mother has just died, is his own. His pal is arrested and sent to prison. Years afterward he and his foster daughter are at the mines, but he has no success. His dog (and this dog, a fine bull terrier, is a feature), while plunging in the creek for a stone, brings up gold. This is the best touch in the play. Later the pal turns up, and is sent away with money, but the girl overhears. She forgives, however, and even though her foster father loves her himself he gives her to another. It is a good story. It is well told. The acting is satisfactory, and most of the photography is good. It has weak spots—that is, weak for a Pathe, but they do not mar the picture.

"How She Triumphed" (Biograph).—It was vigorous treatment, but it was effective and the homely girl became handsome and rosy under the physical exercise directed by her friends. Instead of her having no attention, as she expected, the improvement in her looks were sufficient to make her attractive and the other girls were the ones to suffer.

The acting in this comedy is natural and makes it a very pleasing film.

"The Sheriff and the Man" (Lubin).—This Western story appeals to the heart if it doesn't to the mind. It is easy to understand that a sheriff might be grateful to a thief who befriended him when he was in dire straits, but whether it is well to allow this to go as far as allowing a prisoner to escape is a question which has been discussed before. It is true in this instance the man who escaped was not the guilty one, but the sheriff supposed him to be, which left the officer's moral obligation just the same. The background is the sandy alkali desert. The play as a whole is interesting.

"The Reformation of Jack Robins" (Melies).—This Western picture presents the case of an outlaw, wounded unto death, cared for and nursed back to health by a woman doctor. The inevitable results, but Robin is given to understand that he must reform before the doctor will marry him. He "does" five years' time and when he is released from jail, the doctor is still waiting for him and she marries him, a reformed man. The love story appeals to the heart like all such stories, but aside from that the film has less interest than those usually put out by this house.

"The Witch of the Everglades" (Selig).—This Indian story gives an accurate reproduction of life in the Everglades of Florida as it was during the days of the Seminole Indians. In this picture a squaw who survives an Indian massacre in which her husband was killed, goes insane, her baby stolen and she left for dead. Sufficient instinct was left her to want to kill every Seminole she could find. Years afterward the blow of a bullet on the head restores her memory and she finds her daughter. The scenery is interesting and the characterization leaves little to be desired. The idea of losing the memory is not new, but it is worked out in a new way. In fact, the whole picture is well worth seeing. The woman is held in superstitious veneration by the Indians, which is a true portrayal of the way they look upon those who are wholly or partially insane.

"The Child and the Tramp" (Edison).—Here is a story of a tramp which is at once pathetic and humorous. For the sake of a child who befriended him he journeys twice a long distance to get the money some sharpers have virtually stolen from her father. And then, upon returning it, he fails to remain and take part in the rejoicing. The most interesting portion of the film is the delineation of tramp character. It is perfect in so far as it tells what a tramp does and how the call of the road is the strongest influence in his life. The action is good, while the photography is clear and the situations shown are some of them thrilling. The audience plainly testified its pleasure.

"Slabsides" (Kalem).—This Western story, whose greatest interest lies in the scenery, represents everything that is appalling in a desert. The Mojave Desert is shown in all its horror, including Dry Lake, that elusive spot which has appeared in mirages as clear, sparkling water to many a thirsty traveler. And more than one has died upon its brink when he found that it was hot, burning sand, and not water. As a scenic film this is interesting. The story has as much merit as many other Western pictures, but scarcely more. It is well acted.

"Enemies" (Pathe).—Here is a tale of Royalists and Republicans in France. The Royalist girl aids a Republican soldier and he in return aids her and her father to escape from the Republicans. But there is no love story. The Republican soldier does not return and marry the Royalist girl. This is sufficient change to make the film notable. Acting and photography are alike good, while some of the scenery selected as a background is picturesque.

"Pastime in Chili" (Pathe).—Scenes in a bull ring in Valparaiso are given on this film. The picture is very realistic, lively enough to suit the most exacting, but some criticism was heard of the subject. A few sitting near the writer thought it scarcely the thing to be presented to American audiences.

"The Peace Offering" (Vitagraph).—This comedy presents a domestic mix-up in which a woman is arrested for wearing her own coat. The combination of errors came about through a cook leaving and taking the mistress' coat with her. Then comes the notification of the police and the arrest of the real owner, who takes the coat from her former cook on the street. The story is admirably worked out and the situations are funny enough to keep the audience amused.

"Forgiveness Is Sweet" (Pathe).—We have here a modern rendering of the old story of the grasshopper and the ant, portrayed by two actresses whose work deserves commendation. The story is like the old one of the grasshopper and the ant, excepting that the grasshopper, a street singer, becomes a popular actress, and when she finds the ant, her friend, the seamstress, in want, she forgets the rebuff she received under similar circumstances and helps her to more prosperous times. This ending makes a pleasant story of the old fable. It is well told, and the audience appeared to like it. Mechanically, it is up to the Biograph standard.

"A Fascinating Bachelor" (Lubin).—This sparkling comedy presents in attractive form the adventures of a rich bachelor who becomes the cynosure of the eyes of all the marriageable women in town. But he falls in love with a nurse employed in his house. And then comes a wedding. The actors have caught the spirit of the picture so sympathetically that the audience is admitted to the inmost secrets of all the fluttering hearts of the women interested.

"The Two Sides" (Biograph).—This story is almost a sermon upon the old theme of the brotherhood of man. The discharge of an employee and his despair because of his sick child forms the topic of the picture. Later, when he discovers the child of the former employer in danger he risks his own life to save her, and the two fathers are drawn together by a mutual sympathy. The story is simple, stirs the emotions, and pleases with its plainly stated admonition to return good for evil.

"Scenes Along the Mekong River" (Pathe).—This film gives a series of beautifully photographed views along this Chinese river. The quaint junks, and the people on them, and other features combine to form a valuable educational film.

"Her Master" (Selig).—This is a picture reproducing Colonial village life. It is winter, with a heavy snow on the ground. The first scenes are in or near a school, which, with the quaint costumes of the master and pupils, is interesting. The contest between the schoolmaster and his high-spirited girl pupil has a human touch that will hold the interest of the audience. As the story proceeds, showing first how the master relents, after punishing the refractory pupil, and then how the girl, at first bitterly proud, later humbles herself, the interest increases. Here is a reasonable, human story, well handled by both author and producer, and well photographed. The action is restrained and free from that tone of many a period picture, stagy grouping and posture taking. This picture looks as many of its scenes, like life.

INDEPENDENT.

"A Day with an English Bargeman" (Powers).—This is an excellent outdoor picture, aside from the presentation of a class to which modern life knows so little, a trip on the trip along the English Canal, affords interesting sights because of the little suggestive pictures showing how the people live and what they do. The company is to be commended for producing such an attractive film.

"Melody of Fate" (Powers).—The fear that one who loves has left on leaving the sight of the other's eyes, and the sense of loss when death has taken the loved one, is the double ordeal of this story, and both the man and his love in this case are musicians. The lover in this film is made his sweetheart blind. She is cured and the man undergoes a dangerous operation to cure his blindness. Unfortunately he passes away from the operation. Outside the door his sweetheart plays his favorite melody, but it is of no use. She is also admitted to see him, he falls back dead. The film interests, since there was scarcely a move in the theatre while the picture was running.

"She Wanted a Man With Brains" (Champion).—In this western story a school teacher friend's turns down a whole outfit of admiring cowboys and later decides in one of them, who was very much in love, that she wanted a man with drama, not a cowboy. It interests, this man goes away, studies and becomes a prosperous lawyer. He revisits the ranch with his wife. The school teacher, not knowing that he is married, now endeavors to win him, but he introduces his wife. The picture has some amusing character studies, and some pretty scenes, but, though interesting, is not highly dramatic.

"His Wife" (Nestor).—This has qualities not infrequently found in Nestor films, viz: freshness of theme and a human story. Here a trouble-maker gets soundly trounced for his mischief-making, and the friendship of two men is not broken by it. The story is refreshing. Married people are not all jealous, there is friendship in the world that can endure, even when a man marries the girl another once wanted. Here are really human men and women. In that respect, certainly, it is a good film. The photography is excellent, like all the Nestor films, while the players have performed their parts with appreciation.

"Vengeance Hath Been Had" (Reliance).—This film gives us a story, not a picture of life, and a story that, though interesting, is not very dramatic. One man in drink blinds another and escapes. Both grow up. The blind man has a daughter; the other man a son. These children fall in love. Before they can marry, Fate has to blind the second man also. This film is easily on a par with a great many films and will be accepted by many audiences, but will have no long popularity.

"The Count of No Account" (Solax).—A hotel keeper expects a count and advertises that he is to have a distinguished guest. His house is at once filled with snobbish people, but the count doesn't appear, so the keeper bribes the cook to play the part of count. His cookship takes advantage of this position, borrows money and blackmails the hotel keeper. There is one scene that may displease; the chewing gum scene is far-fetched and of doubtful value. There is one very good scene. The cook-count is at dinner and he is serving the soup. He seasons it to his own taste, sipping it out of the ladle before he serves any of it. The Solax Company has the making of an excellent farce here.

"Foolshead as Telegraph Errand Boy" (Itala).—Foolshead is a favorite and New York audiences applauded him as errand boy to the echo. He appears here in one of his characteristic comedies. It has the usual "mix up" where people and things are overturned right and left, and a grand rush, ending in one of the funniest scrimmages we have seen in some time. It brought a roar of laughter from the spectators.

"A Bottle of Milk" (Itala).—A gentleman loses his milk bottle three mornings running and complains. The dairy girl is discharged and a man hired. Watching for the next delivery the gentleman discovers this man and believing him the thief a wild chase follows, as lively as it is destructive. And then, after it is all over, and the real situation is disclosed, the gentleman himself gets a vigorous belaboring.

"Locked Out" (Reliance).—The sub-title describes this as "A Little Journey to the Brotherhood of Man." It is the story of a strike and lockout. The owner of the plant is a hard, tragedy-making, love-denying man who rides roughshod over all who oppose him—wife, employees and business associates. We have pictures of starvation in the homes of the strikers, and later, when the lock-out is declared and the workers come with their wives and children humbly to plead to be taken back, they are shot down, men, mothers and the children at their breasts. Before the hardhearted owner, the ghosts of these martyrs rise and he dies in his chair. Then we see his ghost awaken and leave his body and meet the ghosts of these murdered men and women. They greet him as a brother whom they love. As one scene succeeds another, the impression that they create grows deeper and more suggestive. The terror and flight of the capitalist's wife, his visions of those slain and his death, with the vision of himself and the murdered family, reunited. It is all very dramatic and very impressive. It belong in the class of educational films because of its deep ethical significance.

"Hearts Under Oil Skins" (Power).—Here we have a story of fisher folk. "Bachelor Bill" drew the slip which made him guardian of the little girl saved from the sea. She grows up, falls in love with someone else, though her guardian loves her. Then comes a series of complications, resulting in her lover's going away, leaving a letter directing her to marry Bill. Then Bill enters, finds her crying, sees the letter, reels under the stroke, but bravely sets out to find the lover, which he does, sends him back to the girl, while he himself goes out to tell his sorrow to the sea. The picture closes with a striking view of rocks and water, with the heart-broken man gazing at the little frock in which the waif was dressed when she came to them. The lithe toning of the sea scenes give them much beauty. The picture clearly interprets its title and will doubtless be a very popular picture.

"The Scarlet Letter" (Imp).—This picture is the most notable film of the week. The story by Hawthorne is so well known to a majority of those who will see this picture that its exploitation seems unnecessary. The Imp players have reproduced the salient features of the tale with wonderful fidelity to facts and have made of them such fascinating bits of characterization that those who see cannot but admire. Hester Phrynne's disgrace and her years of shame appeal very strongly to the emotions. Her loyalty to Dimmesdale who was responsible for her downfall, her public degradation during long years, her rehabilitation at last, only to have her lover fall dead in her arms, make a picture which it would be difficult to praise too highly. The characters are reproduced as they might reasonably be expected to be. There is a quiet beauty and dignity about Hester, even in her disgrace, which appeals with more than ordinary strength. The picture has seized upon and has emphasized the salient points in the story. It is good and will be popular. The audience sees the scenes change with unusual attention.

"The Boss of Lucky Ranch" (American).—This Western picture, which will please because there is plenty of life and action in it, and what is better than anything else, a tenderfoot who undertakes to boss a ranch. When the cowboys begin their pranks he devises a means to defeat them. This defeat is what pleases the audience, especially. Anything of this character is always popular and the situation here is so marked that it is all the more attractive. The picture will delight any audience, since, as has been pointed out a good many times, there is genuine enthusiasm when a contest of this character occurs.

"The Realization" (Rex).—This is a delightful picture. It is not dramatic, but it holds an ace of trumps in its baby. That baby is easily the star attraction of the week. The rich man and his wife were drifting apart and were childless. The baby of the wife's dressmaker is left by its mother in one of the rooms of the house. That baby—how can a man critic describe its attraction—touches the hearts of both man and wife and puts new love into each. It touches the heart of the audience.

"Naughty Miss Edith" (Lux).—This comedy introduces a gentleman by the name of Timothy Hair and details his adventures while making love to the pretty girl at a hair dressers. When they got done with him he was forced to wear store hair and store whiskers, for he had none of his own. The action is spirited and the audience liked the picture.

"Bill's Garden" (Lux).—Here we have a short comedy which tells how Bill established a garden in one of his rooms. The garden did not cause much difficulty, nor did the bath with the ducks, but when the watering process began there was trouble and to spare. The novelty of making a garden in the house and its success keeps the audience good-natured. It was very amusing to the audience; but as gardening is so much a passion with French people, it must have been excrutiating to them. Bill certainly did want a garden, to make it in his bedroom.

"Across the Mexican Line" (Solax).—This story is based upon the imbroglio in Mexico. It details a love story, coupled with the thrilling adventures of a woman spy. Apparently the Mexican general did not get the information he wanted, and the prisoner was recaptured by the American troops. The climbing of a telegraph pole and sending a message from its top is a novel stunt which pleased the audience. The situations are also interesting.

"An Elevator Romance" (Thanhouser).—The way the elevator is utilized here is both novel and delightful. The breezy briskness of the hero who falls in love with the telephone girl with the pleasant voice and brave heart, together with the fine work of the actress who takes this heroine's part, gives this film a high place among recent releases. After the hero rescues her from the fire in which she lingered to warn others, what could she do but succumb. The picture is lively and being built upon a plan different from most love stories it pleases the audience.

"The Girl of the Coral Reefs" (Yankee).—Here is illustrated again the call of the life that one has lived from childhood. The girl, even after her own people found her and she was taken to a home of luxury, could not overcome her longing for the sea and the simple fisher folk who had brought her up from a child washed up by waves. Accordingly she returns to them. The story is of shipwreck and a child lost, found after many years through a peculiar series of circumstances. The longing for the familiar life touches a responsive chord in the breasts of the audience and they sympathize with her in her desire to go home.

"Clark's Capture of Kaskaskia" (Champion).—This is a historical film of merit, reproducing the capture, during the Revolutionary War, of Kaskaskia, Ill., by George Roger Clarke. With 200 Virginia backwoodsmen he made a forced march, surprised and overpowered the sentries and suddenly appeared with the stars and stripes in the midst of the revelries of a ball. This is an excellent bit of historical work, with a love story interwoven. The action is spirited, and the whole story well-conducted. The photography is generally good, and the entire picture is good enough to warrant including it among the educational releases.

"For Their Mother" (Eclair).—In this story, two fine lads of about four and five have the leading parts, and they are fine. The earnestness with which they enter into the story and the skill with which they play their parts make the picture one that is worth while seeing, and one that audiences probably will take keen pleasure in. The two lads can't buy the medicine that their sick mother needs. They are not permitted to beg, but notice that a mountebank gets money for his impersonations in a cafe. It is highbrow begging, that's all, but the boys get up a little play and it is successful. Then the ending, where the gentleman follows them and discovers what prompted the action and relieves all necessity of repeating it, pleasantly closes a picture that takes a firm hold upon the emotions. The simple story grips strongly.

"The Blue Nile" (Eclair).—In this picture we are taken on a delightful excursion on the Blue Nile. The photography has been so managed that many marvelous beauties of the glorious Egyptian scenery are faithfully presented. There are glimpses of boats dancing over the rippling waters, palm trees reflected in the water, and, toward the end, a gorgeous sunset, the whole closing with a silhouette of "Mehari." It is an outdoor picture that will linger long in the memory.

"Second Sight" (Imp).—This is a love story with a Kipling touch. One of its features is the second sight of the young girl who, at the gate where she and her lover used to meet, sees him, though far away. Another man who loves her has played the villain and sent him off to South America. This vision is given to both the absent man and the girl, and is the means of bringing them together. The perfidious man is moved to go out himself to search for his one time friend, and brings him home.

"A Kentucky Girl" (Yankee).—We have here a homely, human nature story. The scenes are laid among the mountains of Kentucky where illicit stills are common. Love and jealousy form the ground work, but the girl, true to her lover, lives with his mother and helps her while he is in prison. In a short time he returns, for he was innocent, and there is a happy reunion. The picture is thrilling in places, and there is a homely sentiment running through it which goes direct to the heart. One scene good to see is the hero's mother seated at her door and smoking a good old Missouri meerschaum. The scenery is interesting, the photography good, and the picture as a whole commendable.

KALEM.

THE LOYALTY OF DON LUIS VERDUGO.—Lieutenant Marmion of the Coronado Scouts arrives at the ranch Verdugo and meets the pretty daughter among the occupations of Southern California by the Spanish Dons and Mexicans. Two Lieutenant others of Marmion have followed and the Ingenue Senorita Verdugo becomes pleased. Don Luis Verdugo also becomes pleased with Marmion and considering of him as a possible husband for his daughter. Don Luis, however, is also considering of the Spanish Lieutenant, and Maria Louisa, the daughter of Don Luis boy who had asked her to marry him, or remain obedient to her father. It was a hard problem to decide, but she decided. How?

EDISON.

EDNA'S IMPRISONMENT.—Mrs. White is compelled to discharge her nurse on account of extravagance. The following day her friend calls to take her to a matinee. But she cannot go, as there is nobody to mind baby, so they decide to leave it at Mr. White's office in his care.

Arriving at the office, they find Mr. White has gone out on business. They leave baby in the clerks' charge, who do all sorts of things to keep baby quiet. They play hide and seek with it, next time a policeman. Jimmie is the policeman, and the wardrobe is the jail. Jimmie locks baby in for not having a license on her teddy bear and pockets the key. Now, Jimmie is sent out on an errand by another clerk, and forgetting all about baby, rushes out of the office.

In the meantime Mr. White returns to the office, and finding it near closing time, orders his clerks to go home. They set the time lock on the safe and lock it.

Then some one reports to Jimmie, who is home eating his supper. Suddenly he remembers that he locked baby in the wardrobe. He arrives at the office just in time to prevent the men from dynamiting the safe, who are under the impression that baby is in it, after bursting all over for it. Baby is restored to the arms of its parents, and Jimmie gets me.

THE BABY OF THE BOARDING HOUSE.—In a genteel boarding house, kept by a widow with a small baby, there are among other boarders two young men, one a steady and industrious worker and the other an idler.

By his persistency and boldness he works himself into the good graces of the industrious young man's sweetheart and succeeds in making quite an impression on the young lady as well as her parents, who extend an invitation to him to attend the theater where of course he accepts.

The next evening, just as he is getting ready to dress for the theater party, the widow who keeps the boarding house compels him to mind her baby while she goes some marketing. Being indebted to her for a considerable amount of money he cannot very well refuse, and the poor "four flusher" has an awful time of trying to amuse himself and pacify the squalling baby at the same time.

Meanwhile the young lady and her parents, tired of waiting, come to his lodgings to ascertain the cause of his delay. The arrive just in time to hear the widow berating him not only for being so far in arrears, but for abusing the baby as well, and sounding a sue shows him the door. The young man's parents, hearing the true state of affairs, quickly decide that he would make a fine husband for their son-in-law, and the industrious young man once more finds favor in the eyes and in the heart of the fair sweetheart restored to his arms again.

THE QUARREL ON THE CLIFF.—Two brothers, Tom and Jack, are desperately in love with the same girl. Neither of them knows which is the favored one until Jack accidentally discovers a letter in Tom's pocket showing that his relations with the girl are somewhat more than friendship.

Angered at his discovery, he goes out to find Tom, and comes on top of a cliff and decide to fight it out then and there. During the quarrel Tom's foot slips and although Jack tries to save him he runs a great height and only escaped instant death by catching a shrub half way down the cliff, overcome with terror and in pain from which he knows of the catastrophe. He is so completely upset that he is unable to do anything and it is left to his sister and the girl to help him up. In one to undertake the perilous work of rescue.

Happily however, he is only badly bruised, and after a few days is quite himself again. In the meantime he gets shown a beautiful example of ingratitude on the girl's part and the winning of the girl by Jack, whom she evidently preferred all the time.

IN THE BAGGAGE COACH AHEAD.—Tells film leaves a young man riding to a Palmino and trying to appeal a court claim to carriboo. His efforts are unsuccessful. The great attraction of the trip and the young girl's sense of woman have refused, and who asked to one of the passengers who he doesn't like to see. On this condition, he easily informs her of who is on the baggage coach ahead.

Then he goes through the sympathy of the fellow passengers and he proceeds to tell the story of his life in short verse of happiness.

Beginning with his first meeting with his pretty lady, he tells of the subsequent meetings, and the acquaintance of him and his start for the West where his fortune opens him. Made by found there one day. At last the home is ready he sends for her and her supreme joy on entering their home and their unspeakable for their short separation. Her emotions supremely happy a child is born to them, the pride and joy of their little home. Suddenly one day, a shadow falls across their rosy pathway, the little wife and mother is taken serenely ill and passes away after a very short illness, leaving her husband prostrated stricken.

As we fade back to the Pullman at the end of story we see that one sympathetic lady has taken charge of the child and as the man breaks down in his grief, she carefully takes the now sleeping baby to her stateroom. One by one the other passengers move quietly away in silent sympathy leaving him alone with his great sorrow.

VITAGRAPH.

HIS MOTHER.—Donald Gray, living with his mother in Scotland, through the friendship of the family physician, is offered an opportunity to go to America to study medicine. He leaves with his mother's blessings.

Five years later Donald is a physician with a successful practice in New York City. One of his patients has grown very fond of him, at the same time the young physician has formed fond of the gentleman's daughter, and is encouraged to be near her.

His mother receives a pay him an unexpected visit. She arrives at his home just as he is taking of her and her meeting is touching indeed. He induces his mother to take a small cottage in the country so he is afraid that has attended elsewhere. but finds new patients near.

After everybody has settled Miss Gray packs her valise and receives a letter from Donald that she is banished and sick. She is taken to the hospital. Donald, discovering his mother's presence, telephones everywhere to locate Miss Gray's husband at last. He receives a message from a hospital nurse asking him to consult him in a very serious case. Another telephone message informs him that the patient in the hospital desires his best one assigned to the young girl. It is not long before he is back to health again, under his tender loving care.

Helen Holmes is possible, how he forces mothers to run and when the young girl hears at his mother, and she looks at its intended wife, there is an expression of mutual approval, sympathy and love. The sweet and kind old soul of the mother beams with a smile as she lays her hands tenderly on the heads of her children.

PREJUDICE OF PIERRE MARIE.—Jean and Pierre are rivals for the hand of Babette. Jean is a mild, good natured fellow, while Pierre is more quick tempered and exhibit of the two are would never deny as a man desirable life partner, but unquestionably Babette accepts Pierre for her husband. Jean is fond of music, he plays the musical march at the wedding of Pierre and Babette, and when he leaves the girl the impression of his face, and sad and painful one he is on his fortunate rival amongst the best.

Babette gives birth and Jean is always a welcome visitor to the home. She confides to Jean that she has a terrible fear that her husband for the love young persons of Jean and Pierre felt for the maiden.

Pierre, soon it seems as was a victim of jealousy. Under the influence of drink he would use Monks threats he are hanged if unnecessary, continues in using filthy slurs of Babette's character. Jean would on to put an end to Pierre's abusive, when the latter in rage, on one of these occasions, throws the contents of a glass of wine in the face of Jean. The latter, on receiving the insult, draws his knife and fatally wounds Pierre. He then runs to the home of Babette, where Jean lays, and he tells her that Pierre is dead. Pierre, dying, manages to tell his friend that he has committed a murder, and begs him to flee from the country. Jean promises to do so, and Babette, overcome with grief, promises to follow him marry him, she succeeds. Mr. King has a daughter, Mary. Who is lifelong bosom friend and is very much attracted to her father is endeavoring for her friend. Taken a dislike to Miss Graham. Mary has issues the usual advertisement in the paper, inserted by Miss Graham, stating that she wants a home maid. Many of course answer the advertisement but she can get further acquainted with her future companion and as it is no one case of applicants she writes her father that she will spend her holidays with a girl friend whose name will enable her to arrange the position with Miss Graham.

Everything works out just right, and Mary finds herself equipped with one and arrives at her friend's home. Mrs. Graham is a widow and her father whom Mary finds to be a very distinguished and charming gentleman. Mary finds a model and when her father calls to see Miss Graham, and recognizes his daughter, with whom he has not to tell her "Mistress." After she has acquainted her father with the surprise he is going out to service. During her employment with Miss Graham Mary is taken sick and it is then they she gets a first glimpse of the generosity and kindness of Miss Graham's disposition, the good woman gives her all possible attention and tenderly nurses her back to health.

Vacation is over Mary leaves Miss Graham's home and returns to school. After the girls avail a recital of her experience, which Mary makes in one emphatic declaration, that her father's intended wife is one of the best and noblest women in the world.

The day before the wedding of Miss Graham and Mr. King, Mary is introduced to the future Mrs. King, and we can readily understand her surprise when she is introduced to the little "housemaid" as her future daughter.

SELIG.

BACK TO THE PRIMITIVE.—John Wilton cables his sister Helen in London to leave for South Africa via S. S. Chino and engagement to Sir Percy Sefton that Lord Thurlow sails on the same ship and is to act as her escort. At the same time telling her he will meet them at Cape Town. After a hurried preparation for the departure the long journey is begun. Lord Thurlow is attentive to his charge that he may fulfill the wishes of his friend and confident, John Wilton. Will Carson, a fellow passenger aboard, much admires the beautiful Englishwoman Helen and seeks an introduction through the ship officer. The admiration becomes mutual and they are seen on the promenade deck together at every hour. Their action causes much uneasiness on the part of Lord Thurlow, who interferes at the discharge of his duty, and is in turn insulted by Will, much to the disgust of Helen, who regrets the pub-licity of the incident.

The approaching storm rivets the attention of all on board and for a time the unfortunate affair is forgotten. When 500 miles off the coast of the Transvaal each and all are struggling in the treacherous waters of the sea. After two days' time famine and starvation made the survivors of the ill-provised raft almost welcome death as relief. On the third day they are discovered and rescued and sufficiently revived wend their way to the jungle in search of civilization. A deserted but furnished native shelter—but must be guarded night and day, for the country round swarms with wild beasts and life in these parts is all but pleasant. Helen, secure on the top of the thatched roof is startled to see lions and leopards prowl around almost within hand reach. Thurlow is a fine shot and he protects his fair soldenly. Two years elapse and the brother who had mourned his sister as dead, has his attention called to an article in the press referring to the wreck and suggesting that it was possibly the Chino. An expedition by elephant train was organized and John, trusting in kind providence, sets out to find the party. After many vigilant days and nights the anxiously awaited for the coming of the fire is found, their hopes were soon realized and amid the greatest rejoicing brother and sister are reunited over the dead body of the lion that killed Ilon that the party were compelled to kill in the rescue.

THE PUNCHER'S NEW LOVE.—Harvey Barton, a young cowboy is happily wooing Edna Rogers, a pretty western girl. One day he calls at her home, shows her a handbill advertising a Wild West show, to be held at a nearby ranches, and asks her to go with him. On his way back to the ranch he comes upon a beautiful young woman, whose horse has met with an accident and Harvey dismounts and basilfully asks her if he can be of any assistance. She accepts his help and invites him to accompany her home. She is inclined to flirt and easily turns the foolish young cowpuncher's head, and the unsuling smile with which he invites her to accompany him to the dance. On the evening of the dance Harvey waits in vain for Edna's lover, but is later invited to go with a young girl of Harvey's and she accepts. At the dance Kate is snubbed by the city girl, who—later, at the door of the village hotel, gives Harvey a cool farewell and the information that she is returning to her own home the next day. Two weeks later Harvey goes to the city, calls on his new love, receives an icy welcome and is finally given out of the house by the latter. Broken in heart Harvey returns to the ranch, and starting to win back his first love, realizes his terrible mistake and is later found dead by his first sweetheart and her new lover.

WILD ANIMALS IN CAPTIVITY.—Their care and management is one of America's finest Zoos. Lincoln Park, Chicago. In importance, magnitude and value the Lincoln Park Zoo in Chicago, is second to none in America. Covering over 40 acres of ground in one of the finest municipal parks in America, its collection of rare animals, birds, etc., is world known. Commencing with a small one of great value. Among the most important features of this zoo is the buffalo herd, which is the largest of Buffalo or American bison, of which it was the largest herd in the world. The Essanay film company has secured many of the finest specimens of the subject is made novel and unusually entertaining in certain novel features, never photographed or seen in motion before. Also shown is surgical operation on a three month's old Siberian camel who has the pitiable fortune of a giant python snake, measuring fourteen feet in length, removed from the immense jaws of the reptile, while it remained in the throngs of fear or horror as pictured in all. We also see the clipping of the claws of Prince Heiland an African lion, a variety of manicure work which would not prove entirely lacking in the average salt-chinese. Among the many animals seen in the bill will be found the following: Bears, wolves, zebra camels, buffalos, lions, tigers, leopards sea lions, birds and fowl of all kinds, reptiles, monkeys, etc., etc.

THE MASTER AND THE MAN.—Henry Jenkins, who has served him time in state's prison, is released. He now seeks his former confederate in crime, Jack King, who is living in affluence.

King is not overjoyed to see his former pal, but Jenkins comes just in time as King's butler has left and has been absent for some time. Jenkins dons the habiliments of the butler and enters upon his new duties.

King loves Elsie Graham, who gives her heart to Ralph Webster. Miss Graham and Mr. Webster are guests at the opening Ralph Webster's garage of an opportunity and asks Elsie to marry him and she consents. He has forgotten the ring and announces he will return by the 5:30 car.

One of the guests wears an expensive necklace, which Jack Ralph, Jr., King cannot resist the temptation to steal it and the act is noted by Jenkins. The loss is discovered and suspicion is cast upon Ralph, who left the house in a great hurry. The woman who loses the necklace employs the services of a clairvoyant and invites all the guests to be present at the test the following day.

King is the last to arrive. The woman lapses into a state of hypnotism and announces that the thief who stole the necklace is in the room, being smoothly shaven. Ralph and King are the only men present devoid of hirsute adornment, so he makes off unobserved. Suspicion falls on Ralph, of course, and he is driven from the house by the fiancee by her irate father, who believes him a thief.

In his grief Ralph calls on King and tells him of the fickle nature of Elsie's heart and leaves. Jenkins who has been refused by Elsie, is penitent and his better nature asserts itself. He bids Ralph be of good cheer and he vanishes Elsie's home to his rooms. She does so and King assures the pair that he will return the necklace by pawning the missing necklace. They are happy and King is overcome with disappointment and is inconsolable in his grief at the departure of his successful rival. Ralph and Elsie leave much elated.

King subsequently pawns the lost necklace and a letter to take to the woman from whom the jewels were stolen. In the letter he confesses to having taken the necklace. Jenkins returns to the park he stops and reads the letter. He tears it to half and writes that he—Jenkins—is the thief, and that he can be found at the home of King. He delivers the necklace and letter and returns to find King dead by his own hand. Overcome with emotion, burns the letter written by King and calmly awaits the coming of the officer, which is inevitable. The story ends with Jenkins once more at the office of the warden of the penitentiary, coming voluntarily, to serve time for a crime he did not commit.

THE LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER.—Tom Aikins, a sturdy fisherman, loves Polly Berry, the daughter of the old lighthouse keeper of the light. Bert Duncan also loves Polly and is insanely jealous of Tom.

The course of true love runs smoothly for the happy couple with the exception of an attempt on the part of Duncan to force his unwelcome attentions on Polly. He is soundly thrashed by Tom and vows vengeance.

The wedding of Tom and Polly occurs and Bert, evidently penitent, congratulates them, assuming a friendship that is feigned. With the marriage of the couple, Bert takes to drowning his sorrows and becomes reckless.

Polly and her father are about to go on a fishing trip. Tom asks to accompany the girl and the old man assents. They sail away, happy and contented. A furious storm arises and the ocean is instant into fury. Night approaches and the fishing smack does not return. The old lighthouse keeper is apprehensive. He starts to the lighthouse to light the beacon.

Bert has been drinking heavily and he conceives a devilish scheme to wreak vengeance on his successful rival. He will go to the tower and tamper with the light! Leaving Tom and his bride, unable to get their bearings in the storm, will go ashore on the treacherous rocks. He ascends the steps of the base of the light and is confronted with the keeper. He must prevent the old man from ascending the tower! After a struggle in the lighthouse, he struggles with the aged keeper. There is a violent fight and old Nat, endowed with a strength that is almost superhuman, wins by reason of the peril of his daughter, overpowers the desperate young man and staggers up the stairs and lights the lamp.

The fishing boat of Aikins, is in terrible straits. The lights of the tower flash out across the watery shrouding the boat of Aikins. Through no good reason, at his failure, staggers out of the light-house and, endeavoring to reach the mainland, falls off the rocks and is drowned. His descent down the lighthouse steps is spectacular, falling and rolling down the steps in his mad fury.

The storm continues and the scene is shown with the waves running mountain high. The villagers congregate on the bluffs, awaiting the safe return of the fishing smack. Finally, the waves having subsided, the boat is shown, making a landing with Polly and Tom in the joy of their friends, the old father being conscious that his struggle with the younger man was not in vain.

ENGAGED IN SPITE OF THEMSELVES.—Mr. Cabassel and Mr. Lacassagne plan to bring about the marriage of their children, Claire and Rudolfart. The young people object as both of them are secretly engaged already. At last Claire has an idea: they will write anonymous letters to each of the parents —Claire's father is informed that his future son-in-law is a confirmed drunkard, and the doting parents of Frederick are made aware that the fiancee of their darling son is the victim of a terrible nervous disease. The two parents fall into the trap laid for the deception, and next time they meet in the presence of their elders, Fred's nose is made to resemble a flag, and Claire's face is covered with red as the collapse on the spot! The parents can think of nothing but some way to side-step this pending misfortune.

When matters have reached this climax, Frederick writes Claire's father, telling him that he Paris on urgent business. Claire's parents are delighted that he is about to make his departure so easily. Claire, on the other hand, and Frederick meet to congratulate each other—they show one another photographs of their sweethearts, and both express dissatisfaction. Fred says Claire's fiance is bad-looking; Claire thinks Fred's is too intelligent, and in mutual disgust they tear up the offending photos. Each is moved more than they care to show by their impulsive actions—at last they agree to get together and tell the next moment each is clasped in the other's fond embrace —each is glad to be engaged to the other themselves! Without further delay, they confess to their parents their naughty stratagem, and all ends in the most desirable fashion.

LUX.

THE POSTMISTRESS.—Alice Lomene, the postmistress of the village, and her little girl are protected from the wrath of a tramp by a gendarme, and the acquaintance thus made soon ripens into something stronger. One day the gentleman presents himself at the post office and addresses Mr. Lomene a telegram addressed to herself. It asks her to become the wife of Gerald Delaine, but as money is forbidden by the service of the telegraph. But Delaine receives his answer by a letter, in which the postmistress informs him that she returns his affection. That night Delaine is invited to supper, but hardly has he sat down than the postmistress has a visit from her husband. She is reading the message off when suddenly her countenance changes, she is reading that Delaine is signed by the police on a serious crime. She staggers back against the wall sick with horror at the thought. Meanwhile Delaine has succeeded in obtaining again an impression of the keys of the safe and is somewhat impatiently awaiting the return of the postmistress. Making his way to the storeroom steps into her child's room, and softly calling to a passer-by, urges him to fetch the police at once. She returns, and presently Delaine and the police arrive. It is a most trying period for the woman, who sits listening for some sound of the helpers. Finally a knock is heard, and, reading the truth in her face, Delaine demands to know how he can escape. He bounds over the child's cradle, but the postmistress bars the way. He is silent to strike her when the police burst into the room, upon which Delaine seizes the child and flings him away. Then only does the brave woman break down under the weight of the shock, but the voice of her little child rouses her, and entering the room, she takes the little one into her arms.

A WALK IN TUNIS.—This is a pretty little scenic film of remarkable quality. Included in the series are views of a street sale of furniture, the old quarters of Tunis, and the market place, with a confusion of nationalities. It should prove of the highest interest to an intelligent audience.

POWERS.

THE FOUR OF US.—Four jolly good pals sign an agreement that in fifteen years from date, at the same place, they will meet again, either in person or by message. Their college days are over and they all go out into the world. Five years speed on, and at last the fateful day arrives. One by one we see the pals renew the destined rendezvous until these are three of them present. They greet each other heartily, remark on the changes time has made, but there is no sign of the fourth man. The three wait anxiously and turn sadly downcast that the great musicians has completely engulfed him.

But fate has made it even worse. The fourth pal has fallen a victim to evil influences and in fifteen years he has become a moral wreck—one of the underworld—an burglar. He was soon tossed about on the waves of adversity and on this very day he is planning to burglarize the very house in which the moment is held, his life having been such that he has forgotten altogether about pals of other days. Under cover of night he forces in a window and comes into the house, but he is destined to experience a turn in the tide, for his discovery leads to his identification by the three pals, and the faltering footsteps are turned in another and better direction.

CONTAGION.—Did you ever sit in a street car and see the man opposite you yawn? Then what did you do? You yawned too, didn't you? Not that you wanted to yawn, but nevertheless you did, just because the other fellow did. Now, when the man opposite you saw your oral cavern expand he yawned too. And before you knew it somebody else down the aisle saw one of you yawn and yawned too. He immediately became the temptation for somebody else, who yawned, with the same effect on whoever saw him. That's contagion. See?

AS YOUR HAIR GROWS WHITER.—"Would that I could turn back the hand of time." Patrician and plebeian voice the hope in vain, forgetting that the hour of to-day is but a second in the great to-morrow. And so is it too, with dainty Dolly, a society bud for whose heart and hand Harold Grimdale would give his life. Dolly is a coquette, and cruelly plays with him, favoring a rival, a count. At social functions she snubs him shamefully, and at last, in distraction, he accepts an office to go to Alaska.

The years roll on, until more than a quarter century has passed. Dolly's hope of becoming a countess has been ignominiously blasted, and with the years she has not only lost the charms of her youth, but also the host of admirers as well. Life holds no joys for a woman of her years unmarried, nor will the years be denied their toll. But the once beautiful blonde crown is now gray.

Thirty years of the calendar are gone. Harold has done well in the northland and now he returns to the scene of his courtship. He goes to her home, and the once aged butler fails to recognize him. But he convinces him that he is the same Harold and asks for Dolly. As they both turn the grayhaired woman passes the window. Harold goes out on the lawn and steadling up softly once more let in the scene. She looks at the white-gray hair and then pelts to her room, but to him she is still the same Dolly, and the similar crest of white does not change the love of other days.

THANHOUSER.

THE REGIMENTAL BALL.—A prosperous young man, with an independent fortune, receives an invitation to a regimental ball, and he sends his heart to the daughter of the Colonel. He dances with her and pays her most devoted attention. It is love at first sight on his part, and the girl is greatly pleased with his attentions.

The young man wants to see the girl often and in his ignorance of the line of caste that exists in the army, decides to enlist, so that he can be near the object of his affections. It soon develops that he is not to has not himself off the list of her acquaintances for a Colonel's daughter moves in an entirely different sphere from that in which a raw recruit uneasily gravitates.

There is a lot of hard work in the army and little time for anything else that is so far as the enlisted men are concerned. And the young man finds that life is hardly a bed of roses. His cup of sorrow is filled to the brim when he learns from one of the enlisted men that the Colonel's daughter and her cousin, the Lieutenant, are engaged.

While passing the Colonel's quarters one day, the young soldier hears him receive a report that the Lieutenant has been stricken with smallpox and that his case is grave. It is impossible to get a man who will volunteer to nurse him, and the Colonel does not like to give orders that may send another man to death.

The recruit hesitates for only a moment. Then he thinks of the girl. The man he believes she loves is dying. It is the manly thing to do what he can to save the life that belongs to her. He volunteers to nurse the patient, and brings him back to health again.

Then his duty done and his love hopeless he decides to leave the army. He tears his discharge and prepares to leave the post. First he writes a letter to the girl, telling her why he is going away, and that for love of her he had saved her sweetheart. This letter he gives to his former patient, now his friend and asks him to deliver it after he has left the post.

The Lieutenant sees matters out what the note is about. He knows the girl does not love him and that she does love the brave nurse. So, to partially settle the debt of gratitude that he owes the other man, he destroys the note at once, giving a shadow for explanations before the recruit can leave the post.

The Colonel's daughter acts with military promptitude. She does not propose to have her own life wrecked on two accounts. She loves the young man who became a soldier for her sake, and is convinced that a sweetheart so unselfish would make a husband worth having. So the services are swept away and his devoted love rewarded.

THE RAILROAD BUILDER.—The construction of a new railroad destined to bring prosperity to a section of the country brings sorrow to one home. An aged hermit finds that his home must give way for the new line to be designed to cut through his homestead which has been in his family for generations. His agony, of course, but the property is condemned and a legal battle ends in defeat.

The old man's grief arouses the sympathy of his daughter, who tries to succeed where he has failed. She visits the railroad president and makes an appeal to him, but he scoffs her, and she returns home thoroughly despondent.

A young farmer, who has vainly sought to win her, sees a chance to win her gratitude and perhaps her love. He arouses the neighbors and brings them in a body to the girl's home. There they promise their aid and start off determined to drive the construction gang away from their territory. Their leader is the young farmer, and the girl has told them how she has been warned away when she told the workers to leave the property.

When the farmers arrive at the spot they find that the workmen have knocked off for the day. They see that the work proceeds only very slowly, the pile of filling has not been made. The young engineer in charge of the work arrives after the farmers have left and he has difficulty in soon that he and his men cannot cope with the throngs. He resigns his job and threatens to ride to a near by town, where there is a new appointment and summons the aid of men who are quality and kin. But the farmers anticipate him, head him off and tell him that no men can reach him. That they route him in the woods. The gang was soon torn before. The engineer sets out unsuccessfully to bring aid to his men. Now comes unexpected aid. And then the young engineer is the odd one of the individuals who had spoken reasonably to her whom she had ordered his party away. She decides to say some good to bring assistance. She mounts the horse, and gallops away, arriving in the town exhausted but still in time to bring the engineer before those threatening to ride everything away. The engineer realizes that he owes everything to the girl. She soon wins her father's objections to a possible unprofessional man wooing her, and induces him to withdraw his objections. And the fire that is kindled by a touch of vengeance becomes the hearest light of a happy love.

A CALIFORNIA LOVE STORY.—Pequita, a Mexican girl, is attached to the cause of the insurgents. Medina Porter, a gringo, arrives after all the tamales be seated at an easel and glancing around spies Pequita. He approaches her. At first she feigns indignation, but he eventually engages her in conversation and within a short time they become fast friends.

Pequita trusted Porter, trusted him with her honor. She loved him, and like other trustful girls, she soon realizes his cause and going to the padre, confesses him to save her honor. This he refuses to do and if leaving who is dressed goes to the padre, making a full confession of her guilt. He bids her go tell all to her mother and Manuel, the brother, always distrustful, follows, overhears the conversation, and swears revenge. Pequita and Porter go for a walk by the sea. Here she makes a final appeal. Again he refuses to protect her, and bids her to go. Manuel (who has been following and watching all the while), intercepts her, and again hears the story of her shame. Porter, apparently deeply moved by his disagreeable action, remains standing on the beach, when Manuel, who has been watching him from the cliff, takes aim and fires. Porter falls, badly wounded.

Pequita is broken hearted, and going to the padre for consolation, learns that the wounded man will live. With careful nursing, at the end of two weeks, Porter is convalescent, his heart has softened, and he decides to atone for his wrong doings. The padre unites them, gives them his blessing, and they go thoughtfully on their way.

THE OPIUM SMUGGLER.—Bonnie is the daughter of Peter Watson, a fisherman, who derives a comfortable living for himself and family from the historic waters of old Monterey Bay on the California coast.

Watson has chosen as a husband for his daughter Tony Laredo, who, with his mother Jonathea, lives a life of ease. Bonnie, however, is in love with Ned Raymond, a young fisherman, and this love is returned with interest. Ned is suspicious of Laredo, and discovers him at the illicit traffic of opium smuggling.

While spying upon the smugglers at work in their den he is attacked from behind, falls from a cliff, is carried to the den, and left still unconscious. He soon recovers, however, and surprising Laredo at work in the entrance to the den, takes him captive.

Watson, who has gone out in his boat to fish, is delayed far beyond his usual time of return, and his wife is greatly worried. Leaving Bonnie to guard the prisoner, Ned and Mrs. Watson go to the shore, and discover Watson, his boat capsized, battling with the waves. Two men have just landed on the beach, and Ned, jumping into the boat, commands them to make haste that they may save the drowning man.

After a strenuous battle with the waves, Watson is rescued more dead than alive, rowed to the beach and escorted to the cottage. With the application of restoratives he soon recovers, is told of the smuggling operations of Laredo, and in gratitude to Ned, who has rescued him from a watery grave, calls Bonnie, places her hand in that of Ned, and bids them be happy.

RELIANCE.

OVER THE SHADING EDGE.—Jane Grierson, a newspaper reporter, is engaged to Tim Henry Wyeth ostensibly an honorable, wealthy man. She stops in his office one day while he is temporarily out, and suffering from a severe headache, she sits in his chair behind a high roll-top desk with her head on the arms, awaiting his return. Two men come in and failing to see her discuss a gigantic swindling scheme, at which the profits are to be divided that evening. She flies back to the newspaper office and notifies the editor, who accompanies her back, with his assistant, and the men overhear themselves in an adjoining room. Jane can come in, and Jane is horrified to find that Wyeth is the ringleader of the band. Her life is threatened by the swindlers, but she is protected by Wyeth. Before being led away by a detective, a pathetic parting takes place between the lovers.

After many lessons and accidents Algeron is pitted against a prize fighter. Algeron is seated a left hook on the jaw which destroys all of his dreams. She writes a note to Algeron expressing her dislike for boxing, and as he gazes at it he is pleased and battered countenance in the mirror he realizes it has been for naught, he presents a pitiable appearance.

NESTOR.

AFTER TWENTY YEARS.—Charles Rossmore and his wife, Constance, are happy and delighted at their only child, Sagwa, his wife's beautiful little girls. The ten-year old lad draws a picture of his father that is remarkably life like. A dissolute fellow traps Mr. Rossmore in a den of crime who rob, assault and brutally beat him, then abandon him almost lifeless, taking with them nothing of value, even his clothes.

On recovering consciousness, the unfortunate man sees no longer himself. His face is gone, his backbone is bent, his personality, his family, his position, his fortune, his home, all blotted from his memory.

Friendless, penniless, mindless and alone, he drifts out into the world, a hopeless bit of clay.

The husband and loved one are reported. Constance to inform the police; but the machinery of the law fails to find a trace of the missing man. For years the broken hearted woman searches for him.

Finally developes into an artist of national reputation. At the age of thirty, he reaches the zenith of fame and success.

One day, ragged picturesque old tramp, in the midst of a crowd of juvenile merrymakers, attracts Constance's attention. What an ideal model for his next picture. The old wanderer is persuaded to pose, and already his hoary face adorns the canvas, showing to his mother the picture, he is astounded to learn that her new model is none other than her long missing father.

The old man is quickly gathered in, and everything is done to make him comfortable. A brain specialist is called in, but all his efforts to bring back the wandering memory are futile. Constance is about to give up all hopes when Constance and Sagwa remembers her husband's picture that Arthur had drawn twenty years before. It is brought forward and placed beneath the gaze of the retired old man, whose mind finds itself at last.

YANKEE.

AN INDIAN BRAVE'S CONVERSION.—After the smoke inhale Parson Hastings has effected the change of heart of the bad characters that had for so long the community of Parker upon the heels and Indian were almost one centuries, creating Tom Mason a miner. The arrival of the minister's daughter caused a change of mind and the thereafter his congregation increased.

John Brown, a bad character attracted by the gold which had been found in Tom Mason's claim, began to create rivals in John's way of thinking he thought that Violet had shown favor in regard to Tom Sagwa, the Indian, once showed his love for Violet by little offerings that were received with a show of friendship.

Soon incensed at the favor shown Tom at a meeting held in camp and after Tom has left he meets him in the woods where he provokes a argument. John is knocked down by Tom, who then has cause to question for same again.

In the heat of the argument Tom leaves forget his knife. John is at war with the world from which flowers, which he has been pulling for Violet. John inwits him by teasing the flowers. Sagwa is thrown to the ground beaten. John exits. Sagwa picks up the flowers finds the knife and trails John.

John is found dead by an inner, who finds Tom Mason's knife by the body. Tom is charged to by by Violet, who has learned the news from her father that he will be hung when caught by John's friends.

Tom takes refuge in the mountains. The lesson of the sermon "Thou Shalt Not Murder" "Shalt Not Kill." The Indian reads the truth is further brought home to him as he sees the despair of Elsie as the men ride away on the man hunt encouraged by a reward notice posted at the church door.

Elsie alone in the camps the Indian enters. He regrets her pain. Word comes that Tom is captured. The Indian confesses. They mount horses and arrive just in time to save Tom from death.

THE BANANA PLANTER'S PERIL.—The opening scene shows a massive banana plantation with the native huts in the background. The brutal overseer has abused a little native maid and disregard for him the plantation. The native American finds her in tears and learns the story of her persecution by the overseer whom he sends for. Upon arrival he orders the overseer off the ground. He leaves the plantation vowing vengeance upon the American, which he soon proceeds to do by inciting the native bands to kill the American and burn his home.

The little native maid overhears the plot and starts to warn the American. She has been caught eavesdropping by the overseer and others and they confine her in a hut. They decide to have her dead. The girl however, is far from dead as shown in the picture. With agonizing efforts she frees herself and starts on a race to warn the American as being in his hammock and tells him of the approaching natives upon his home. He carries her into his bungalow and starts to barricade the place against invasion. The girl in her weakened condition, unable to rise, crawls back to the house of the Padre and begs the good Father to come to the aid of the American, which he promises to do. In the meantime the natives reach the American's home in advance of him and besieged it, attacking and wrecking it.

The American, aided by a native boy, has put up a gallant fight with overwhelming odds against them. When native bands the fire place has been fired. Every window has been broken. The tumult is at its height as the priest reaches the scene and taking the cross from his girdle, he raises it aloft and in the name of the church he commands the natives to desist. The great power he wields over the natives he shows as they kneel in submission to his command. He orders them to carry off their wounded and the fight ended.

The young American, wounded, totters from his ruined home and humbly gives thanks to the good Padre who has saved his life. Peace is now impressive as the girl and the young American kneel to receive the Padre's blessing.

CHAMPION.

CIRCLE C'S NEW BOSS.—Ethel Hanna resides in the Bent Arrow Hotel, which is the only place in the mining town in Arizona. One day a lawyer comes to Ethel and gives her word of her Uncle's demise. Ethel receives information that she is the sole legatee. With beating heart she calls her maid and packs her belongings and sets forth on a long journey to the West to claim her inheritance.

Her Uncle had died in a wild paroxysm of rage, brought on through the refusal of his foreman, Steve King, and some of the disorderly compunchers of the place. Steve, who is an unscrupulous fellow, took full advantage of his employer's sudden death, so he immediately sets about confiscating other valuables and documents, including the land will and testament of the ranch owner. The assistant foreman, however, one Harry Newton, a gentlemanly fellow, discovers the treachery and the evil designs of the foreman, and rescues his late employer's property from the hands of the villain.

Ethel arrives at the ranch in time to witness a quarrel between Steve and Harry. She interferes. Steve, unaware of her identity, brutally challenges her right to interfere. He does this to his sorrow, for the next minute he is discharged, and driven from the place by the compunchers under orders of their new mistress.

Harry is now made foreman, having won favor in the eyes of the girl from the start. He, in turn, appoints Jack Wilson his assistant and Jack straightway becomes friendly with Hiram Ethel's maid, who has accompanied her on her long journey West. In the meantime the villainous ex-foreman plans to get possession of the ranch and oust the new mistress. He is a subterfuge he succeeds in getting her away with him on horseback. Then comes a wild ride, with Harry and the cowboys in hot pursuit in a fiery chase. Subsequently a fight in the death between Steve King and Newton, in which the latter is victor. It is not long before it becomes that the fair Ethel business has found fortune in the shape of Harry.

GEN MARION, THE SWAMP FOX.—In no period of American history was romance in its most conspicuous form current as in the days of the Revolution, and of all the heroes of that epoch, the name of none stands out in bolder relief than does that of General Francis Marion. The very mention of his name spells the greatest hatred and soul inspiration, into many a young and valiant one of the Britain. In a masterfully realistic manner, some of his many striking performances are reproduced in this most remarkable story of "Marion's Men."

The "Swamp Fox," as the cruel and crafty Tarleton dubbed him, is portrayed with a rare fidelity to historical truth. Some of the incidents of his career graphically depicted are here interwoven with his sterling feats at the fall of Fort Watson, in April, 1781, and the great victory won at Eutaw Springs, which was fought in the same year.

The companions of this wonderful genius were akin to him in many respects. Here, for instance, his right hand man in his dare-devil exploits, one of the church, who on occasions donned the purple robes of office to minister the Sacrament, and then doffed them again for the belted sword and the cocked hat. Then the woman—the loyal true-hearted women of revolutionary trial and suffering, are here shown in all their fortitude.

GREAT NORTHERN.

THE NUN.—A monk who cherishes a secret passion for a young lady, sees her receive an admirer in secret and holds their embrace. The latter notices that he will place the girl in a convent. This is just what the crafty priest wants, and he soon has everything in readiness to carry out the priest's wishes. The next time the lover calls upon the lady he is surprised and captured by a band of armed men, who take him to a dungeon. Before the day arrives on which she is to take the veil, the girl finds a message in the drawing of her a file and a note telling him of her impending fate. He manages to get away, but pondering to take effective action against the priest, he goes to a powerful prince, who listens kindly to his story, and promises assistance. On the night before her admission to the convent the wicked priest visits the girl. The girl flies back of any other weapon, attacks her persecutor with a candle. He calls in the princess and accuses the girl of blasphemy. A hasty trial is given her, and she is condemned to be buried alive in the vaults of the convent. The dreadful sentence is being carried out and the last stones are being placed in position when the prince arrives at the head of a band of men. The girl is saved and falls into the arms of her lover, and the wretched monk is hurried away to punishment.

REX.

THE GUARDSMAN.—The king frequents the favorite inn when out on the hunt. To the same comes a countess and others, but none of them are the monarch's fife. Anxious to ascertain when next the king will be there, she informs the guardsman of the king's troupe and with her wiles secures the information from him. Gretchen, Carl's sweetheart, is the daughter of the innkeeper, unhappily notes the change of Carl's affection and broken-hearted, determines to bide developments.

On the day upon which the king is to be at the inn, the faithless countess and innkeeper tells him that she greatly desires the position of waitress of personally serving the king. And against the earnest protestations of his daughter and because of a gold piece given to him, the innkeeper consents to permit her to get as maid. The king arrives and orders his wine and the countess pours something besides the wine into the glass. Her act were undetected by all except Gretchen who suddenly cries out to the king not to empty the goblet. The king calls for an explanation and following it the countess and Carl are taken into custody. The king out of gratitude presents Gretchen with a ring, which he says he will redeem by granting any favor she may ask and at once Gretchen prays for the pardon of Carl which is promptly granted, although the king dismisses him from his service.

SOLAX.

NEARLY A HERO.—Mr. Howard refuses to let his daughters marry a man unless he displays the essence of his wish. Alphonse, the young man, is heartbroken. Jack returns to the city where he is employed by a band of desperadoes they scrape gain by the bold method of holding up folks and upon one occasion they rob Alphonse of his money. Jack arrives in time to save him. A note arrives for Jack and he leaves Alphonse to keep watch.

The same is found that by forcing him to assist her at a certain place she secures an opportunity to get her revenge. She arrives on the scene and Alphonse is arrested. As he lies in the bed wondering what to do he sees the note on the table and he opens it and, seeing upon a piece of paper. It proves to be the gentleman who has caused to report a gang. Jack comes on the scene and Alphonse tells him of the message. Much to their chagrin the message is found to be a note from the gang to the band. From the manner of the note he puts up a good fight and as a result he was the successful. Mr. Howard, seeing the fight from a window, is convinced that Alphonse is a hero and gives his consent. Mr. Howard's daughter and both live happily ever after.

THE SOMNAMBULIST.—The village farmer, while a-feeding and while the sunrise is an old-fashioned clock for awhile keeping. His voice that his son Tom, a lot of fifteen cents on its way to the village store from a dime store of money lost by a shopping tenderloin if the one-cent stamp and the dime are rewards. Long distance is less the number of a thousand and cent and less the expense of the good luck.

Then again the factory worker who never takes the luxury from the dime and nickel because it is the greatest time and money saver in the world. This is the reason why the factory worker and the business woman get the best as well because and is depicted thing of value.

After so many years of satisfactory and driven by means of power, every good in the right to use the machine. Sole knock and mail order is to develop trade and home. Within again we may see where reason through our home. This also is the reason why to use your, where he digs up the means he sends the sale before. This modern home encouragement and a super condition follows.

AMERICAN PRESS ASSOCIATION

GENERAL OFFICE

NEW YORK, May 3rd, 1911

Levi Clide Co.,
24 Union Sq. East,
New York City

Gentlemen:

We thank you for calling our attention to the fact that several concerns making lantern slides are using American Press Association photographs.

Your Company has the exclusive use of our photographs for the purpose of making lantern slides, and we desire to assure you that we will make every effort to protect you in this matter, and that any other concern appropriating pictures upon which we hold the copyright will be prosecuted.

Yours very truly,

AMERICAN PRESS ASSOCIATION

Exhibitors everywhere are clamoring for them, fighting for exclusive town rights, so here is your opportunity to get in on the ground floor.

Subjects that vitally interest the public—the headliners in the newspapers—live topics—attractions that when properly advertised always bring the money and therefore easily rented to every exhibitor.

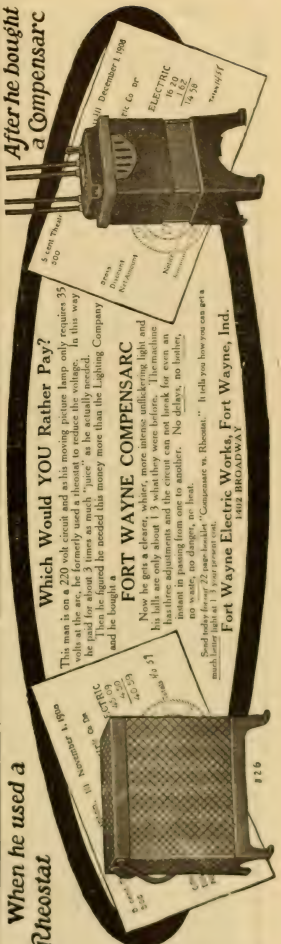
After he bought a Compensarc



When he used a Rheostat

Which Would YOU Rather Pay?

This man is on a 220 volt circuit and as his moving picture lamp only requires 35 volts at the arc, he formerly used a rheostat to reduce the voltage. In this way he paid for about 3 times as much "juice" as he actually needed.

Then he figured he needed this money more than the Lighting Company and he bought a

FORT WAYNE COMPENSARC

Now he gets a clearer, whiter, more intense unflickering light and his bills are only about 1/3 what they were before. The machine has three adjustments and the circuit can not break for even an instant in passing from one to another. No arbors, no lathing.

Send today for our 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat." It tells you how you can get a much better light at 1/3 your present cost.

Comparing the real cost of Light

An actual test has been made under similar conditions on a moving picture arc lamp, using 1600 watts energy, and here are the results in each case.

Alternating Current with G. E. Mercury Arc Rectifier, 5000 c. p.	Alternating Current with Transformer, 3800 c. p.—1200 c. p. less.	Direct Current with Rheostat, 3100 c. p.—1900 c. p. less.

G. E. Mercury Arc Rectifier

Produced 32-38 Per Cent More Light with the same consumption of energy.

Using alternating current directly, 60 amperes are necessary to obtain 4800 c.p. Using direct current obtained by the Mercury Arc Rectifier 20 amperes gave 5000 c.p.

Convincing—isn't it? These comparisons plainly indicate how you can get more and better light at a less cost. Find out all about this device and what it means to you. Mail coupon today or 'phone our nearest office.

Getting 2 Thanhousers a Week?

THE THANHOUSER WO-A-WEEK

RELEASED TUESDAY, MAY 23

A Timely Picture

The Stage Child

is just the release for this period in our national existence when the matter of the right of the child to act is being so strenuously agitated everywhere. Many eminent persons feel that a child has no right upon the stage; many just as eminent feel otherwise. The present picture leans to neither one side nor the other; it gives merely a new, true view of the question, one based on an actual happening from real life. The happening has been reproduced solely for the sake of the human interest that is in it.

No. 213. Code Word, Stald.

Getting 2 Thanhousers a Week?

RELEASED FRIDAY, MAY 26

A New Kind of Bunco Story

Get Rich Quick

is the story of a poverty-stricken man and wife, who, after they had gotten the riches, concluded they were better off poor. How this realization came to them is just what makes the story the dramatic gem it is. The human interest in it will enthrall you—hold you captive until the reel works out to its wonderful conclusion. The picture achieves a distinct mission in teaching that gold is not all and that it is useless, after all, to gain it the way so many of the "best people" do now-a-days.

No. 214. Code Word, Rich.

The New Thanhouser Photoframe consisting of five original photos, 11x14 inches, of the leading Thanhouser players framed in solid oak, mission finish, complete with glass, GOES TO YOU FOR $2.50 with order. This is the prize outfit that tickled-to-death exhibitors the country over are calling THE GREATEST LOBBY DISPLAY BARGAIN EVER KNOWN. Address Exhibitor's Dept.

THE LIFE OF MOSES

When this standard five-reel subject was issued by the Vitagraph Company a little over a year ago, we printed in the MOVING PICTURE WORLD a descriptive reading for each reel, prepared by the Rev. Madison C. Peters. The demand for copies of the WORLD containing these readings have exhausted our supply, so we have reprinted them in pamphlet form.

This important Biblical series of pictures should never be presented without a lecture, and, to make this possible, we will supply the exhibitor with the complete set at the nominal price of Ten Cents, postage paid.

Film Criticism in the Lay Press.

In certain quarters, exhibitors of moving pictures are suggesting that the newspapers should send their dramatic critics to the picture houses, the same as they are now sent to the houses playing regular drama. We had thought that matter over many times before. Sometimes the idea looked good to us, and then at other times it did not.

Eventually we expect to see the lay press take up the work of criticising the films and in that way relieve us of a very monotonous and thankless job. This will come at a time when the average photo-play has reached a height which will compel the recognition by newspapers of the work of motion picture dramatists. At present newspaper criticism of films in the locality where the film is being shown will be of very little value to the exhibitor who is asking for the innovation. The film criticism in that case would naturally come a day after the picture had been seen and had gone on its way, which would be of very little value to anybody. Local comment, moreover, is not compatible with the change-daily and first-run idea. Neither is it a good idea when one thinks of some of the films that are being produced nowadays, because some untrammeled dramatic critic might turn into very humorous reading the serious efforts of some misfit producer. That this is true is already demonstrated, for we have before us now as we write this, a criticism which makes a burlesque of a dramatic film. The criticism appeared in the Albany, N. Y., Evening Journal. It is filled with mock heroics, and altogether the critic seems to have had a very hilarious time writing it.

When the films are uniformly better and finally attract the attention of the metropolitan press, those great newspapers with a subscription list near the million mark may do something in the line of criticism that will be of service. Large metropolitan dailies cover a great deal of ground in their immediate vicinity, and often as far as 500 miles from where they are printed, but to a very limited extent. The metropolitan daily critic will be of no great benefit to the community until pictures are good enough to be kept on the boards for a week. Such pictures as the "Fall of Troy" and "The Tale of Two Cities," which are masterpieces in their line, are already attracting the attention of the press in many cities, where in many cases the film is booked for a long run or a return engagement.

Perhaps the film critic of a metropolitan paper will never be able to work as much havoc in the picture trade as he has done before in the theatrical line. By his edict the dramatic critic has done, or undone in the past, many productions costing thousands of dollars. This he will not be so able to do with the film play. If the critic comes out in the morning edition with a scathing comment and manages to show why and wherefore the film is not worthy, the said film, if it be below the advertising, can be put into the "can" and another substituted for it much easier than a whole production of theatrical people can be disbanded and scenery sent to the storehouse and another production substituted in its place.

The lay critic will have to adopt a new plan of attack in going after the picture drama, because the film is more elusive than the road company. The film-critic's powers will be, so far as the exhibitor is concerned, limited to his own locality. What Alan Dale has to say about a moving picture in New York will make very little difference to the exhibitor in San Francisco. One thing is certain, that some of the manufacturers of inferior plays will be told the truth in very unsparing terms. It will do them very little good to become peevish and whine when anybody tells the truth about some of their faulty films. There are some manufacturers who have received a good notice occasionally for something that they have done. It is surprising to note how some of them can "kid" themselves into believing that they are turning out uniformly high-class stuff simply on the strength of one or two flattering press notices at some time or another.

There must still be an authoritative paper that goes everywhere, in order that the exhibitor may know what is coming to him, and that paper we expect will be, as it has been in the past, the MOVING PICTURE WORLD. We shall be glad when the day arrives when we can copy directly what the New York World critic says, or the Times or the Herald, and pass it on to our readers in States far away. It will not only be cheaper for us, but what a relief it will be from the whining of the man who cannot stand the truth.

The Municipal Jack-Pot.

In the good old game of poker, a "Jack-pot" is a bad thing for any one with little money to monkey with. The "Jack-pot" is always in favor of the man with the biggest bank-roll, simply because he can raise the ante of the man with the small purse, until the latter is hors de combat, while his money still remains in the pot.

Municipal "Jack-potting" works a great deal along the same lines as the poker game, which probably was the initial inspiration. There is another such old game that grafters play upon the simple bumpkin. They call it "pick out," or something of that sort, because the victim is allowed to pick out his own number. Of course every number is a winner, and the confederates in the game also pick out winners; therefore they are all winners. Having put their money up, it is a question who wins, until the banker calls out, "Twenty-five cents more to stay, boys," and every one "digs" again. Again all are winners, and again the ante is raised. In this way they keep on raising the thing until the Simple Simon develops an acute case of cold feet and withdraws suddenly from the game, leaving his hard-earned cash behind with the confederates, who play the game a few minutes longer, merely for the sake of appearances, and then shut up their store.

The same sort of thing has been going on in municipal politics for years. One illustration of it took place when the Milk Trust desired to squeeze out the small dairyman in New York State. They passed laws requiring that all dairy milking stables should be constructed with solid concrete floor and all cows should be milked by men in a white sanitary uniform, and imposed a number of other rules calling for expensive plumbing, heating, can-washing devices, expensive disinfecting apparatus, and all that sort of thing. Of course the small dairyman could not afford to go to this great expense, but the Milk Trust could; therefore they forced this measure through the legislature and not long after, with tears in their eyes, dairymen all over the State were seen selling their much-prized cattle at public auction, because they had been "Jack-potted" out of the business by the Milk Trust.

The same idea has been applied in many other lines of business, and now we see it applied to the moving picture business. Some exhibitor with a large bank-roll has jammed an ordinance through the New York City council requiring that all open-air theaters in New York City have a solid concrete floor, and toilets with expensive plumbing for both men and women. Somebody is going to be "Jack-potted" out of the business, and as usual, the fellow with the small bank-roll. The idea of a cement floor and running water lavatories in an open-air theatre is laughable. It is such a thinly-veiled reason that it cannot be anything but obvious. Those of us who have traveled with circuses and other open-air affairs, such as carnivals and wild-west shows are in a better position perhaps to see the "joker" in it than anyone else. Imagine a circus with a concrete floor and marble lavatories! This law to be constitutional must include every circus and wild-west show that exhibits in New York; also gospel tents, ball parks, etc.

It might be supposed that the large theater interests have something to do with this airdome ordinance, the same as the Milk Trust had something to do with the small dairyman's exodus. To us it is quite possible to see the fine Italian hand of a gentleman by the name of Sullivan, who is largely interested in theatrical property that suffers more or less during the summer from open-air competition.

To a certain extent we can sympathize with the theatrical interests who have large investments at stake. The airdome business, if possible, is even more of an undesirable affair than the "bungaloo" store used to be, in many cases. It has come to pass that any man who owns a patch of empty ground anywhere, whether he be a showman or not, seems to think it the proper thing to turn it into an open-air theatre with the usual results—bad show, bad business and a bad effect. For these mushroom affairs it is better for all legitimate exhibitors that they should be "Jack-potted" out, as it is all too true that there are too many open-air shows conducted by people who are not qualified to manage them.

"Jack-potting" in the open-air question is not to be considered much in the light of a calamity; the principal fear is that the same thing is going on against the permanent houses where substantial money investment is represented. Many are being slowly "Jack-potted" out by fire laws, standing-room ordinances, license frame-ups, and all that sort of thing. It is a case of the large exhibitor "Jack-potting" the small one. There is no chance to call his hand, except with a hand that is just as good or better, and plenty of money to back it up.

Local Organization Necessary to a National Convention.

SECOND ARTICLE.

In a recent issue we stated as the opinion of this paper that the local organization of exhibitors is the only proper basis upon which a national convention can reasonably stand. Two weeks have passed and we are still of the same opinion, and, judging from returns on the subject, our point has been well taken, for there has been increased activity in many quarters during the past fortnight, and the spirit of organization is much alive.

Our previous talk on this subject partook of the nature of a little fatherly advice to exhibitors upon how to avoid the pitfall of discord in the local association. We resolved into types certain exhibitors who usually have been the principal factors in retarding a lasting organization among exhibitors anywhere and everywhere. No one having seriously objected to our classification of certain types of exhibitors, we consider that our opinion has been well taken, and make bold to go a step further and offer such little suggestions as may come to our minds through experience. These may be of benefit to those exhibitors who may, at the present time, be forming a league, having in view the ultimate idea of a national organization and convention that will really mean something to the moving picture exhibitor, and which will, we hope, define his status as a business man a little more clearly than it is at present.

The week before last we published the drafted by-laws of the New York Exhibitors' Association as a matter of encouragement to exhibitors in other cities who are now organizing. From experience we know that the detail work of organizing is very monotonous and dry. Some one must write a lot of by-laws and many other such formal papers. We published the New York by-laws with the idea also of saving someone that amount of trouble, if they would use them as a guide.

Possibly a few words upon the meeting place of the local association would not be amiss at this propitious time, when organization is much needed and necessary to the forthcoming convention, which now seems as though it will be held in Cleveland, instead of Chicago, owing to the apathy of Chicago exhibitors. Many exhibitors' associations meet in the auditorium of some one of the theaters represented; usually they meet in the morning before the matinee, or at other times in the dead of night, when the show is over for that day. A theater auditorium without an audience is a gloomy place, either by day or by night. It is not conducive to geniality, and has a tendency to arouse a desire for exhibitors to wish to leave as soon as possible. A theater is too large for a few exhibitors to meet in, where they have none of the facilities of a good meeting room. Ofttimes the members spread out in different parts of the auditorium, or the whole affair is very chilly and dismal for lack of warmth and personal contact.

We would advise exhibitors to meet in some room other than at their own theaters. The organization of a little lunch club, located preferably in the business or downtown district, or perhaps near to the exchange district, where managers are sometimes obliged to be at noontime is one good way of meeting. The lunch club idea may be private or semi-privte, according to circumstances in the case, and the financial standing of those most interested. When the idea becomes quite well assimilated that one can meet his business brethren at a certain time of day, say lunch time, he will naturally bend his footsteps in that direction, because there is always good fellowship there and a certain amount of news going the rounds. There is a restaurant in New York City known as Café Leo, where the manufacturers and renters of the Independent faction gather every day and swap notes of their trade affairs. The Café Leo was not organized as a film man's lunch club, but it happened to adapt itself that way and it now plays a considerable part in Independent film movements. We should like to see such a café in every city, because it would be a benefit to the trade.

An exhibitors' organization should properly have an office in an office building, not necessarily connected with a saloon. A saloon meeting room is not worth considering; we speak of those meeting rooms which the saloonkeeper furnishes with tables and chairs free for the sake of the drinks he may be able to sell. All of which is hardly the place to invite a reporter, a reformer or minister or any other such person with whom the exhibitors might wish to confer. A small parlor in one of the local hotels is sometimes convenient, when exhibitors have no time to keep up an office. It is an easy matter to arrange with the proprietor of a hotel to reserve one of these particular parlors for a certain day each week, and by virtue of its being smaller and more cozy than a large, barren auditorium, it is quite certain that more can be accomplished.

The secretary's work of an organization is usually the most exacting of all. It is a thankless job and members of an association should do everything possible to make work easier for the secretary. If possible, allow him whatever money is needed for stenography, and do not be niggardly in allowing him the proper amount for printing, such as blank meeting forms on postal cards and printed letters which must be sent to every member. To save his time a secretary should be given the facilities of dictating his notices to a stenographer, which should in turn be taken to a printer to save him the time of writing manifold letters to each of the exhibitors.

The president also should have these facilities and be allowed great latitude in matters where the saving of time and money is concerned. The meeting should be held at a regular time and place as said before, preferably at a private café, parlor or office, and not in the vacant theater. These hints are the results of experience, and we think they will be found to work out well.

COMATOSE MONTCLAIR.

In calm Montclair (N. J.), where dogs are not allowed to bark and roosters are forbidden to crow, they have ruled out the moving picture show as too stimulating. Cannot some one invent a motionless moving picture show to meet the needs of this pluperfect spot?—N. Y. Sun.

A Remarkable Film.

"Back to the Primitive," which is this week's release of the Selig Company, has qualities that make it not merely the film of the week, but in some respects the most remarkable picture yet produced. Many times it has been pointed out that the proper field of the photoplay is to give pictures of actual human experience. It is no hard matter to obtain, within certain clearly defined limits, a theatrical illusion of danger overhanging the stage hero and heroine. The photoplay disregards these limits. If a moving picture of a truly dangerous predicament is to be presented so that the spectators will get all the thrill, as though they were actual witnesses of the event, the actors must themselves often be in real danger. The thrill that the climax of this picture, "Back to the Primitive," gives, could harly be obtained if the actors had not been willing to be, for a minute or two at least, in a position that gave them little chance of acting in any save the most human and natural manner. When a man and a woman, armed only with a bow and arrow, are being chased through an African jungle by two fierce lions and at the end are charged by one of the lions—no kitten either —and about as fast as a lion can go, it is no wonder that they seem truly nervous. In "Back to the Primitive" that is just what happens. The spectators know, by instinct, that, if the lion had truly reached the hero and heroine of the scene, the picture that was being taken of it wouldn't have been shown. But let us outline the photoplay briefly, so that we may describe just what is given in it.

The first scene shows us that a man who lives in Africa is sending to England for his sister, Helen. In the next scene we see Helen and her escort en route on the ship. At Suez, an American comes aboard. We then see a wrecked ship. The illusion that it is the same ship is not strong, for the wreck is covered with barnacles; but it is the actual hull of a steamer on the rocks. Helen, her English escort and the American escape on a raft, and reach the beach, grown with such plants as one would expect to find in Africa. Then we see the stockade they have built for protection from beasts. It is night; five or six leopards are seen prowling about in the forest. It is made plain that they kill the Englishman. Now a scene is given to show us that Helen's brother has hopes that she has been saved from the wreck and is still alive. He prepares to find her. Again we are in the forest with the castaways. The American has a bow he has made. The girl is dressed in leopard skins. It is a tropic jungle and just behind them among the trees, two lions are seen coming. They are big beasts, ugly looking, and they see the man and woman and start for them. The man sends the woman onward out of the picture and stands waiting with his bow.

The next scene shows the party of Helen's brother arriving at the signal flag on the beach, placed there by the American to attract passing ships. There is an elephant which carries two men, men on horses and Africans, with spears and shields. When they find the flag, they begin to run, following the tracks of the castaways.

Again the picture shows us Helen and the American alone. The girl has refused to save herself. The lions are coming through the trees. One of them leaves the cover and charges straight for the man and woman. It is a real charge. How the man and woman acted, this spectator doesn't know; he was watching that lion. It came very fast indeed. It is about to reach its prey when the party of Helen's brother arrives. We see a man with a white helmet dart forward, kneel on one knee, aim and fire. The lion falls and the Africans and others dart out and finish him.

And the audience relieves its pent up feelings in a sigh of relief and a burst of applause.

Foibles of the Photoplay.

By C. H. Claudy.

Some bright brain evolved the theory that "every knock is a boost." It is a comforting theory—especially for the knocker, who thus has opportunity to indulge in his favorite pastime and at the same time enjoy the feeling that he is really helping the good cause along with his "boostings." With this in mind, I would knock and knock hard. And whether you believe it or not—especially you producers—I really do wish the business well, and believe in it and its future. Only, not being interested, save as one of the nickel-paying public, I am decidedly under the impression that the moving picture making business is just in process of being born, and that lots of the pictures are still-born—and their parents never know it, but take their offspring for "live ones."

We are off. Let us whoop it up. Let us take Kalem and jump on him, her, or it with both feet. Let us be specific and specify "Slim Jim's Last Chance." And, that we may jump hard and with a clear conscience, let us say all the nice things we can, first. The scenery is beautiful—undeniably Western and breezy and magnificent. As Kalem didn't make the scenery, perhaps this isn't much praise. But they chose it. And the photography is first-class. Kalem did the photography, and it has seldom or never done better. The acting is about as good as could be expected under the circumstances, but it is very doubtful if you can make people act very much to order when your orders include a melodramatic vehicle supposed to be full of courage and vigor and manliness and hate and revenge and all the other lovely passions which are as meat and drink to the producer, and which is actually so "tanky" and unnatural that no one can believe in it. If the public can't believe in it—if everywhere you see this thing you hear subdued, "But why—how—I don't understand—" and "Isn't that perfectly foolish—look at that beautiful scene—" and "Which is which and how did they both get there at the same—Isn't she pretty?—No, I think it was the other fellow who was in prison—" How do you expect actors to be sincere? You can't. The producers, however, apparently can.

However, to the best of my recollection, the story of "Slim Jim" runs like this: "Jim," a depraved prison character, and another man, first timer, are released from jail. Slim Jim "beats it" West, sitting in the open door of a freight car! I'm not a tramp, but I've always understood that brakemen have a great objection to tramps and that they don't allow them to sit in open freight car doors. However, Mr. First Timer has a hard time getting work because he is a "jail bird." So he goes West, too—walks. And, of course, both he and "Slim Jim" strike the same town. With only three towns in the West, which is only nine acres across, it is perfectly natural for them both to strike the same town. It is also perfectly natural for them both to find the same employer. Naturally, First Timer falls in love with Kind Employer's daughter, and she with him. Equally naturally, of course, "Slim Jim" steals Kind Employer's Money and threatens to "expose" First Timer if he tells. With Magnificent Courage—capital letters and great emphasis—First Timer tells Kind Empioyer Slim Jim is stealing. Kind Employer turns them out when "Slim Jim" says First Timer is a Jail Bird, and everyone—audience particularly—is Very Dejected!

Well, they go their ways, First Timer to the desert, "Slim Jim" to "jail." But the girl follows First Timer. They get nicely lost together, and about the time when Mr. First Timer is wondering what on earth he is going to do with himself and his girl, lost in the mountainous desert, five minutes from the ranch, he is relieved of his difficulty by a horde of Approved Kalem Indians (and it's a shame to capitalize them, for they are distinctly good-looking Indians—all dressed exactly alike in new store clothes), who chase these two luckless individuals behind a rock and bombard them. The First Timer is a wonderful shot and he holds the "Indians" in check beautifully—you can almost hear the stage manager yelling, "Not so fast there, on the left—think this man has a machine gun? Die, you Jim, you're dead long ago. Damn it, Bill, how can you expect to face all this shooting and not get hurt? Miss Heroine, crouch lower, you're a shining mark as you stoop there—that's better—don't hit that crank too fast, you—this isn't rapid action—"

Well, about this time, "Slim Jim," jailed, escapes in a most realistic (?) fashion—details omitted here for the sake of brevity, but they include an obliging cowboy who drops his gun on the ground, and another, who stands guard asleep! Anyway, it was necessary for "Slim Jim" to escape, and he escaped. Of course, he makes straight for the battle. It wouldn't be a show if he didn't arrive there in the nick of time. And the way he rides through the "Indians" and escapes unscathed and turns around and fights with First Timer and the girl—my!

Of course, too, the sleeping cowboy awakes two minutes later and follows on the trail with seventeen other cowboys, whose horses are saddled, ready and waiting. The number of unemployed cowboys always ready with saddled horses to chase anything or anybody on the slightest pretext is certainly remarkable, and the fact that they always chase in a long line leads you to think they must be very carefully graded on each ranch—but never mind! These cowboys "do" a beautiful chase and arrive in the nick of time to kill the few "Indians" of the band who remain alive under the combined efforts of the two men and the girl to kill them off, and then there is a beautiful stage picture with cowboys carefully grouped ("Get back, you Jack—you're not transparent," stage manager, on the side), and "Slim Jim," his bravery redeeming his theft, is given a horse and disappears. He isn't lost, not a bit of it. He has Another Chance!

Though we are tired of Western plays, we have to suffer them. But if we must suffer them, why suffer bad ones? And if Kalem and Pathe and Essanay et al must live out West and hire troupes of cowboys and Indians and produce dramas, why can't they produce logical, interesting, liveable dramas, instead of impossible slush like this? And if they must build playlets on prisoners who love daughters and get told on, and Very Bad Men with a Streak of Good in Them, why fill up feet of film with improbabilities and strange coincidences and other anachronisms like that? It hurts the public's feelings, it hurts the business, it hurts the producer. I know strong plots are hard to come by, but if so simple minded an individual as the present scribe can find in so beautiful a piece of photography only food for criticism and distaste and not even a suspicion of a thrill, it seems to me a producer ought to be able to see the weakness of the story before they spend time and money on it.

I have been told that among foreign films the Itala stands very high. I have been very fortunate indeed, but I have never seen an Itala comedy that seemed to me to have any standard or class whatever, and as for "Foolshead" and his doings, they were a few degrees worse than "Hank and Lank," which is "going some."

I had the extreme pain of seeing an Itala comedy recently, or was it Ambrosio?—so bad that I can't tell you its name, except that it was somebody's bright April fool joke. The waggish son of the house, Tweedledum, who is a very devil of a fellow, is turned out moneyless by Dad, who seems to have some sense. So Sonny, who is—Oh, a regular village cut-up—he goes and inserts an advertisement in the paper by which Pop offers home, shelter, food and all his money (more or less) to the paupers of the town. The editors—of which there are many—all thank Sonny for his visit, and bow him out. This is the most natural advertisement in the world—to a foreign film—made Editor's mind. It never occurs to them to doubt it. Nev-ver!

So the item appears and the paupers drop their infirmities and swarm to Sonny's parents home, where they find Poppa and Momma out—providentially. So they ransack the house, tear it to pieces, get gloriously drunk and when Poppa and Momma come home and run distractedly through the rooms, now wrecks, the beggars and paupers all find it hilariously funny. And when Sonny strays in with a sign reading "April Fool," why, what more natural than that Papa and Mamma and Sonny and the beggars all sit cross legged on the floor and laugh?

Ha ha! I would have laughed also, if the audience had given me any encouragement. And this is what they call "comedy!"

How different a recent comedy from Edison, in which a little department store clerk and her young swains form the nucleus of a little incident, rather than a plot—a thief steals some money from the young girl's purse, and, during the ensuing examination, hand after hand is reached out to the poor girl's thin little bag, each to leave its help offering, a part of the hard-earned salary to make up the loss all can but too well understand. The audience laughed, applauded and understood—this was real life they were looking at—not horse play farce of a childish order. I don't say it is so, but if the average foreign-made comedy is an indication of foreign humor and wit, then American producers and American audiences are to be congratulated upon the far higher plane in which they laugh.

It was Edison, too, who put forth the story of the Haunted Tower of Moro Castle, in which a legend is most prettily told by a sentry guide to the tower and castle to an American bride and groom. The story is simple enough—a Spanish girl who loved, a father or husband, probably the latter, in command of Moro, who objected, the innocent appearing little intrigue discovered, the order that the lover be shot—the excellent acting of the little woman who conceals her agony and denies her love, but gives way in secret—the husband's following of the girl who goes to warn her lover, his refusal to fly, a reasonably good hand-to-hand combat, ending with the throwing of the lover from the top of the castle to the rocks below—then darkness and the original picture of the sentry showing his guests the place and telling the story. It was melodrama, well executed, well conceived, with nothing in it to mar one's credulity as far as plot or acting went. Oh, yes; one can criticise. The time is past when you can take a picture in broad sunlight, and call it "midnight" and get away with it. Eclair and other notable foreign producers have shown us what midnight can be, in dark blue and dark green tints. To show a distant clock dial, illuminated against black night, was all right, but to jump back again to sunlight and call it "midnight" was puerile and resented by the audience. They won't stand for such crudities now.

One more and I am done. Some one is sure to ask me, if I consider these first mentioned things as freaks, what I would, could or should mention as being a healthy photoplay. I have seen nothing finer recently than Biograph's "Spanish Gypsy," which was so remarkable from every standpoint—scenic, photographic, dramatic, plot, action, characters, costumes and acting, that there was simply nothing about it to call forth anything but praise. It was a simple story of love, betrayal, revenge, and final changing of revenge into love and protection again, but it was so beautifully done—the photography was so exquisite and the action so well considered that, among dramatic films, for me at least, it marked an epoch, a step forward, a model film for others to look at and imitate if they can. And with such simple elements out of which to make a success, why, one wants to know, are we afflicted with slush like "Slim Jim," and "Tweedledum," and live ones with some distortions in them, as in daylight-midnight in the "Haunted Towers?"

I pause for a reply.

Swelling the Box Office Receipts.

ADVERTISING THE THEATER—METHODS OF LOBBY, SCREEN, SOUVENIR, DEAD WALL, FORM LETTER, HOUSE-TO-HOUSE CIRCULARIZING, AND NEWSPAPER PUBLICITY, SUGGESTED AND DISCUSSED.

By George Rockhill Craw.
(Third Article.)

The worst advertising a theater can have is untruthful advertising. The purpose of advertising a theater is to tell of its merits as a place of entertainment. Therefore, before beginning to advertise a theater systematically, it should be made systematically meritorious in all the elements that go to make for box office success, and which I have pointed out in the first and second articles of this series, and which articles dealt with Welfare, Comfort and Entertainment.

We will now presume that all within the power of the theater owner has been done to make his house meritorious along the lines mentioned. He is now ready to tell the public about it. A good place to begin is upon the theater's own screen, an excellent and inexpensive advertising medium.

Advertising the Theater on Its Screen.

Neatly lettered slides, telling of the improvements in the house should be prepared, to be shown on the screen before each performance. These should call the attention of the audience to the safety and comfort of the theater as to Sanitation, Ventilation, Lighting, Temperature, etc. The screen notices usually used by theaters are crude, and amateurish affairs, which detracts greatly from their value as advertisements. As the end sought in advertising is to make a good impression, they should be correctly written as to grammar and spelling, and the slides showing them should be lettered in a neat, workmanlike way. Even if the theater is doing a thriving business, these slides should be shown from time to time so that the audience will not take the Welfare and Comfort facilities, with which the house is provided, too much as a matter of course.

The theater's screen is also an excellent place to advertise its entertainment features. The engagement of a capable new soloist, or of new musicians, may be announced by slides. These screen notices are the theater's "news notes." They set people to thinking and talking favorably of the theater. Here attention may be called to the excellent quality of the picture it is running. If it has advantages as an "early run" house, here is the place to tell about it. Releases of special excellence that are to be shown on a certain future date may be announced, with a word or two about their beauty, dramatic intensity, comicality, or what not. Here, too, is the place for announcements of souvenir distributions. In fact, the alert manager will seek to get every advertising advantage possible out of his screen, and he will do well to study out the best methods for making these advertising slides neat and readable and correct in every way. It belittles a house when an audience pokes fun at the illiteracy or amateurishness of its screen announcements.

Advertising in the Lobby.

A theater's front has great advertising value. If it is neat, well designed and attractively lighted, it will draw attention to the theater. If it is unkempt, mediocre, and poorly lighted, these shortcomings will keep new patronage away, no matter how fine a program it may be offering, nor how attractive its interior may be. Then, too, an attractive front brings people into the lobby, where some of the theater's most effective advertising should be, and usually is, done.

Above all, the theater should have an attractive name, prominently displayed and illuminated—one that may be seen easily at a distance. This name, besides having its own advertising and identifying value, which value is apparent to all, is invaluable in connection with any supplementary advertising the theater may do, and which will be discussed further on in this article.

The matter of having automatic musical instruments in the lobby is one that should be dictated by the class of the theater's patronage. In some localities, music in the lobby might operate to cheapen the house, and in others, especially where many transients pass, it would draw much trade. Only the highest grade automatic musical instruments should be used as lobby attractions.

Attractive metal easels and poster and photo frames should be installed for the most effective displaying of the "lobby decorators" that almost every producer is now furnishing theaters, without charge, advertising their releases. These "lobby decorators" are in most cases masterpieces of the printers,' lithographers', and engravers' arts, so that there is to-day little, if any, excuse for unattractive lobbies. What is not furnished free for lobby decoration by the producers may be reasonably purchased from reliable manufacturers whose appliances are advertised in the leading moving picture trade papers.

Along with the play-posters, photos, etc., displayed in the lobbies, should be shown the theater's own announcements, attractively lettered, announcing improvements in its Welfare and Comfort facilities.

The Personal Element.

We will now pass from the lobby to the box office. Here the first direct personal element of the theater is encountered by its patrons. The impression created should be a good one. The ticket seller, who is usually a girl, need not be pretty, although a pretty face is always an attraction if the head behind it is level, but the countenance should be genial, and the ticket seller uniformly courteous, accommodating, and bright.

A like civility, pleasantness, and an evident desire to please, should be exercised by all other attendants, from the ticket taker to the ushers. Queries by patrons regarding the films, etc., should be answered with care and courtesy. Such queries are the result of an interest that is very valuable to the theaters, and to cut off the inquirers with scant satisfaction or incivility is not for a moment to be tolerated.

Souvenirs as Business Builders.

There can be no doubt as to the merit of souvenirs in building up the box office receipts. This is especially true in the case of "neighborhood" theaters, where a steady, continued patronage by the recipients of the souvenirs may be expected to repay handsomely their original cost. Most probably they are best used by theaters which have an excellent show, but which need extra means to bring the public into them.

Souvenirs are also effectively used to force business at times of naturally lesser attendance, such as matinees, etc. Theater managers should inform themselves as to the various plans offered by premium houses in the motion picture trade papers' advertising columns. They cannot be too alert in informing themselves on every proposition designed to favorably influence the attendance of their theaters.

"Long Distance" Advertising.

So far, we have considered only the direct advertising of a theater—that which may be done on its own premises. We come now to "long distance" methods of publicity, such as dead wall posters, circulars, cards, form letters, and newspaper advertisements. The advertising methods that may be used by one theater may be unsuited to another. In fact, so far as advertising is concerned, they may be divided into two classes, "neighborhood" and "down town." Down town" theaters have a patronage that is largely transient, and people attend them who live at the extreme other ends of the town. The location of the down-town theater is its best advertisement, supplemented by an attractive front and an effective lobby display. It has little, if any, use for "long distance" advertising. I am speaking particularly of the down-town theaters in large cities.

The down-town theater of a medium-sized or small town also usually has little need of "long distance" advertising, but when it has such need it can use dead wall posters and newspaper announcements to advantage, if the town is not too large. Newspaper and posting rates increase with the size of a town so that down-town theaters in fairly good-sized cities have to depend largely on their location, and upon direct advertising done on their premises.

Where newspaper and dead wall advertising is done, the announcements should be short, easily read, and neatly displayed. The posters and ads may be devoted entirely to the welfare and comfort facilities of the theater at the beginning of the advertising, changing them to ads in which the entertainment features predominate, but which mention the welfare and comfort points in neat, well-displayed lines near the bottom. The name of the theater and its location must be prominent in all such advertising.

The "neighborhood" theaters of the small, medium and large cities can all use the same methods. The people that patronize "neighborhood" theaters, live near them. Thus the manager can confine his advertising to his neighborhood with the knowledge that every person that sees it lives close enough to his theater to patronize it conveniently. When he advertises in his neighborhood, he is not wasting any powder.

He may use some little neighborhood publication, the cost of advertising in which is slight, and he may advantageously use dead wall posters, circulars, cards or form letters. If he uses posters, he can make a contract with a bill-posting concern owning boards in his neighborhood, or he may have his own men paste up posters wherever they may be allowed to do so.

He may have attractive window cards printed, advertising his theater and its attractions, which cards may be distributed to the merchants of his neighborhood for display in their show windows. A few complimentary tickets to the show will turn the trick, and even these may not be necessary in many cases.

Another good plan for beginning to advertise a theater is to have an imitation typewritten letter prepared, the name and address of each person to whom it is be sent being filled in with the typewriter, so that the body of the letter will be matched. These letters should be prepared upon a neat letter head of the theater's and should solicit patronage of the person and his family to whom it is sent. They should set forth the theater's welfare and comfort facilities, and dwell attractively upon the excellent character of the entertainment features. Letter postage should be paid.

The names of the persons to whom the letter is to be sent may be taken from a city or telephone directory, or a list may perhaps be borrowed from some merchant or real estate agent in the neighborhood. Care should be taken to see that the letters are not sent to persons living too far away from the theater. Large printed mailing cards may be used instead of the form letters and will go for a cent postage. While not so directly effective as the form letters, they are much less expensive to prepare and to mail.

It is still less expensive, but also less direct, to distribute circulars or cards to the houses of the neighborhood, seeing that the announcements are properly delivered. These should be neat and attractive, and correct as to spelling, wording, punctuation, etc., as the theater will be judged by its advertising.

System the Key to Success.

Any theater seeking to build up its business by "long distance" announcements should do so systematically, and keep them up until the desired end is obtained. A theater in which improvements have been made could do no better, to begin with, than by using a form letter sent under two cent postage, telling of the improvements and the excellence of the program being offered.

This should be followed in a few days by the less expensive card of circular announcement, detailing new entertainment features. These announcements may be distributed by a reliable man or boy from house to house. They should be made two or three times a week, and I have known them to be very profitable when made every day.

At the same time dead wall posters would prove effective in connection with the house-to-house work. In all of such advertising the prominence of the name over the theater, and its prominence on the circulars and posters must not be forgotten to be made. The name must stand out at both ends of the line, and both ends must meet—at the box office.

If the enterprising theater manager will study the four cardinal points of theater management, i. e., Welfare, Comfort, Entertainment, and Advertising, developing and perfecting them all in a systematic way, he will quickly solve the problem of box office success.

A $250,000 FILM.

From Seattle comes the intelligence that B. B. Dobbs, described as "the intrepid Alaska moving picture man," is about to endeavor to obtain a film of the "Birth or Death of an Island" in the Bogoslof group of the Aleutian Peninsula during the open season. For such a film it is reported Dobbs has been offered $250,000. To obtain it will require the entire summer, or open season; a specially provided schooner must be used at no small cost; added to this is the important factor that anyone undertaking such a trip risks his life, and the lives of those who accompany him. Why such a venture at such a cost? Education and science have always demanded attention. The North Pole, mountain heights and recesses, the impenetrable depths of dark continents, have each in turn invited the intrepid traveler and explorer to fathom their secrets. Men of ability have ever been found ready to pay the cost and take the risk in these great undertakings; it is therefore not surprising if a new field of research is calling for someone to bring to civilization its own peculiar and wonderful characteristics.

During the past few years the Bogoslof group of islands have been undergoing great changes, islands are constantly arising from or sinking into the Behring Sea. The following graphic description of these strange changes is given by officers of the United States revenue cutter Tacoma: "A new island suddenly appeared from seventy fathoms of water, rising to an elevation of several hundred feet above sea level. It was one of the greatest natural pyrotechnic displays ever witnessed by man. Columns and columns of red flames shot from the waters through clouds of steam that reached miles above sea level, intermingled with it were countless tons of molten lava and rocks, converting the ocean for a distance of several miles, into a seething cauldron of almost boiling water." This grand display was seen from a distance of four miles, the showers of sparks and volcanic ashes dropping on the deck of the vessel made removal to a safer distance necessary. After the fire ceased and the air again became clear a new island appeared on the surface, the sea around being strewn with dead animals, birds and fishes." For the purpose of as near approach as possible to the scene, Dobbs will provide against all dangers by covering the decks of his schooner with asbestos, carrying all his spare rigging and spars below decks; the undertaking is a tremendous one, commanding the best wishes from scientists, educators and moving picture people alike. That such a film will prove interesting there can be no doubt—in an ordinary "show" it will prove thrilling; as a scenic production it will be superior to anything in its class, and from an educational point of view prove invaluable, and no doubt Dobbs will earn the money, large though the amount may seem. For the readers of this page the greatest pleasure comes from the fact that this production would be impossible, but for this age of cinematography; all interested in the moving picture may congratulate themselves that they are aiding in the advancement of all lines of art, science and learning hitherto absolutely impossible.

Nothing is said about an actual view of a vanishing island, but no doubt Dobbs will be on the alert and when the season's volcanic changes begin to manifest themselves, no matter what form the change may take, some valuable and interesting films will be the result.

The cry is still coming from the liquor saloons that the moving pictures are hurting their business; good! may the cry become a howl from one end of the land to the other! Who can tell but that the formerly much abused picture may yet be a power in the cause of true temperance.

Two hours in a picture show is surely better than an evening in a saloon parlor; not only is there no "cup that inebriates" or the "thief that steals the brains," but there is the positive good of moral pictures, often showing the evils of intemperance. In a sociological way it was recently pointed out that the moving picture had several missions of good to perform. This is one of them; may the complaints of evil continue, and the friends of the pictures rejoice.

A VISIT TO THE MOVING PICTURE THEATERS.

With a desire to know the welfare and progress of moving pictures, the writer last week visited some half dozen theaters and "show" places in different parts of Greater New York. While there is no noticeable advance which can be described, there are also no deteriorating features to be recorded.

The pictures seem to maintain an average in every respect and are evidently "holding their own."

It must be remembered, however, by those especially interested, that in anything, a stationary period is one which is "brooding" for a change.

In a progressive march "marking time" is a resting period preparatory to moving forward; if no forward move is contemplated it may mean a retrograde movement. It is to be hoped that the latter is not to be the case with cinematography at this stage; may the coming season see many distinctive advance features in the forthcoming releases. Only one complaint can legitimately be made at this time, fortunately not about the pictures, but about the "places." Lack of ventilation causing foul air is the predominating evil of to-day, in the smaller places, especially the stagnant air is a disgrace.

No education or ability is required to teach people who conduct a small picture show that fresh air is a prerequisite for an enjoyable evening. Managers, if you don't see to this the authorities will, to your cost!

"Great minds think alike." What constant similarities are appearing on the screen from different makers. A French and an American firm have produced the most singular of these counterparts. "A Double Elopement," exact in every essential feature, is the most important example. The great interest in these two identical pictures lies in the Americanism of the one and the Parisianism of the other. Not only do thoughts run in the same channel, but lovers are the same the world over, so are irate parents; language and customs alone differ, and these two plays are an interesting study in contrasts.

This kindred similarity appears often in Western, Indian and military scenes, occasionally presenting interesting changes from different viewpoints which are of educational value. The writer, however, desires to call attention of scenario writers and film makers to the fact that in some instances these resemblances are monotonous and painful; sameness and repetition are beginning to injure the popularity of some of these pictures.

A WARNING.

Exhibitors Beware!!! One of your greatest enemies is the "cadet"—he selects the darkest houses, he trails the younger of your young woman patrons, he meets them on the sidewalk and invites them inside—like a human spider he uses your place as a web to catch his prey, when he is caught himself your place gets the blame. An official report of the religious bodies in Brooklyn supporting the "Society for the Prevention of Crime" says: "The moving picture 'cadet' is a growing evil, many of the girls allured into certain classes of picture places have their tickets paid for them by these 'cadets.' In a few instances where missing girls have been reported, they have been in picture houses in care of these nefarious 'cadets.' Too often have the moving pictures been blamed for the evil that has come upon many young women, whereas in common justice the blame belongs to those 'who love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil.'"

Allow yourselves to be educated by the rate of warning; you who control moving picture places, have them as light and clean as circumstances will permit, and don't allow these fiends to bring you, your place and your profession, into evil repute.

Seen On The Curtain

By Freelance.

"The motto of this paper is 'Fairness to all, with malice towards none.' In criticism or condemnation be severe, if necessary, but be circumspect. Be equally circumspect in administering praise."

So writes the editor to me in giving me my commission. I like that sort of a letter; I like that sort of a paper, and I like the sort of film that one can administer praise to, much better than one about which one must be severe if one is to tell the truth. Unfortunately, one can't run across those films all the time, every day. Of every film one wants to rave over, there are a dozen one wants to rave against.

And nowhere is there room for more raving, either way, than in the realm of comedy. Comedies which are not funny are so common as to need little comment, but when one finds a poster reading, "A great laugh producer—everybody has to laugh at this one" and goes in and pays one's nickel or dime and is rewarded with "Max Makes Music," and comes out with a sad wonder at the type of humor possessed by the people who get these things up, one is inclined to get pessimistic about the moving picture as a cure for the blues! When a producer has to assume an impossibility as a basis for his humor, he is pretty hard pressed. If flutes, the playing of which caused all hearers to dance, regardless of their occupations, were known to the world of music, doubtless "Max Makes Music" would be funny. But, save for the mythical flute of the dear old Pied Piper of Hamlin, no such instrument is known—to the writer at least—and the fact that we see well trained actors and actresses gravely dancing as Max plays this magic flute is not convincing—let alone funny. Even the producer must have recognized the absurdity of trying to get a laugh from his audiences by such means, for after having Max pipe soldiers to dance during drill, a bridal party being photographed, curing the drunk and raising the dead with his pipings, Max is made to pipe to a dog, which also dances, and finally to the furniture in his bed room, the bed finally dancing Max out on the floor being the shrieking climax to this scream of humor—not!

Ugh!

The huge difference between alleged comedy and the real article is shown in a sharply drawn line between this particular "Max" film and "The Leading Lady" (Vitagraph). Not that the "Leading Lady" is a perfect production, by any means, but it is honest, it is possible, it is well done, and, if the effect on the audience is any criterion, it is funny. An opera writer composes an opera called the "Irish Washerwoman." He wants the "type" for his leading lady, regardless of whether she can act or not. So, after sundry trials and failures, he and the manager secure the services of an Irish cook. The action of the piece hinges on Bridget's efforts to be a prima donna, and the trouble they have with her in rehearsal. Bridget happened to be the stout man (John Bunny) with the big nose and the "character" mouth who has made such a hit with audiences, and he is as good an Irish "woman" as he is a capable character actor of men's parts, which is saying a good deal. His facial expressions had much to do with the success of the little comedy, and once you are over the Rubicon of any producer being willing to try a real Irish washerwoman as a leading lady in an opera, even one called "The Irish Washerwoman," the action moves forward smoothly enough. As long as there are people like the Vitagraph staff striving towards a higher plane of acting, of production and of comedy, we can stand, I guess, all the Foolsheads and Maxs foreign "humorists" can produce.

But there comes a time when comedy both fails of being impossible, à la "Max," or of being funny, à la "Leading Lady." And when it isn't very funny, and wastes a very capable staff of actors in the attempt, one feels sorry and in a measure cheated. Why Lubin wants to take a girl like Miss Lawrence, whose ability is too well known to need discussion here, and waste her in a juvenile role such as she has to have in "That Awful Brother" is a mystery. The story is all right, only it isn't funny. Having a drunken, dissolute brother in the family is not generally considered very humorous. Having him come home, get drunk, collide with his good brother's sweetheart (Miss Lawrence) and chase her to his own home, in a vain endeavor to return the things she has dropped, may be ridiculous, but it isn't, surely, funny enough to demand telling in a film. The sweetheart and the maid finally lock him up in a closet, the good brother is 'phoned for, gets his brother out, and bribes him to disappear, and tells the girls there was no one there, after all. And that is all—and little enough it is. But there is one very nice thing about this and other Lubin plays—their interiors are convincing—the walls do not sway, the doors are practical doors, and one really believes that one sees the action in a house—not in a tottery canvas affair misnamed scenery.

You certainly have to hand it to Biograph for beautiful photography. Recently it was a Spanish gypsy thing—now it is "In the Days of Forty-Nine," and if there is any concern which can better pictures, from a photographic standpoint, I wish some one would tell me where I can see them. Incidentally, there was a slight variation from a rather hackneyed theme in this love story, since the untrue wife, wishing to run away with a gambler, is rejected by the gambler after he has played cards for her with her drunken husband and lost, and the playlet ends happily. But the outdoor scenery is beautiful, the photography exquisite right straight along, and if the interiors are somewhat crowded and the action broken by too many changes of scene, the action itself is well done, and the acting first-class all the way through, albeit this leading lady, capable as she is, has still the absurd habit of jumping up and down to express delight as a child of ten might jump. Of course, the present scribe never saw the wife of a miner receive a letter saying her husband was doing well and asking her to join him, but his idea is that such news, while good, is not so frantically entrancing as to make the recipient behave like an inspired idiot. Perhaps the stage manager cautioned her, for she then proceeded to give a convincing presentation of a dissatisfied wife who, later disillusioned, comes to her senses. And to see the Biograph villain acting a hero's part, even if it is a sorry hero, is pleasant for a change—and showed him possessed of considerable versatility.

And what talking about a western play, don't let's forget Miss Marion Leonard in a recent Reliance—"In the Tepee's Light." Miss Leonard deserves a better fate than this. She isn't especially convincing as an Indian maiden, and she is far too good an actress to be saddled with parts which do not fit her. Moreover, the taste which purveys love stories between white men and Indian girls is somewhat questionable—and nothing Miss Leonard does, herself, is ever in anything but good taste. So I think she is unfortunate here. Moreover, in addition to being unfitted for her, the story is dead—it has been so worked over and mulled around and rehashed that everyone is tired of it—Indian squaw—white man—love at first sight—Indian brave buys squaw—white man despairs—gets girl to run away with him—minister won't marry them—back to the tepee—back again goes the white man, again carried girl off—pursuit by Indians—freedom!

But, and it's a big but at that, the Reliance people managed a scene here which would redeem from commonplace a much, much worse play than this. "In the Tepee's Light" takes its title from a scene in which the interior of a tepee is shown, with a kettle over the fire. The audience looks towards the entrance of the tepee from the inside. Beyond the fire, figures appear lighted from below—as is proper—this side the fire, they appear in silhouette—as is also proper. The film is stained light yellow. And I make me my bow to the Reliance management—I have never seen anything finer in a special lighting effect—anything more beautiful than that play of silhouette and bottom light. Especially was it pleasing after so many minutes of plain white lighting in this and other films, and it makes one stop and wonder whether the moving picture of the future will not depend more upon lighting effects and beauty and less upon violent pantomime and action than at present. As a matter of interest, if it be such, I am glad to say that I would rather have seen this film, with this one touch of stunning beauty and originality, than any—or all—I have mentioned in this story, and that quite without regard to the fact that "In the Tepee's Light" as a whole, is a pretty poor apology for a Western Indian play, and with a perfectly inexcusable ending. For the ending (a very weak steal of the last scene in the "Girl of the Golden West") uses a painted, scenic background for the running-away pair! With all the beautiful outdoors to choose from—with real scenery waiting for them everywhere, why, Oh why, Reliance, did you use that atrocious painted thing?

The failure to realize that the greatest argument for convincing people of the reality of a picture play is the appearance of real people amidst real surroundings, is one of the most fatal mistakes the producer can make. If he makes in interior and it looks like scenery, we can't forgive it. We even fail to forgive it on the real stage any more, where we used to forgive anything. Now any producer who puts on a shaking wall and painted canvas door interior on the stage is laughed to scorn. In "The Girl of the Golden West," Belasco used every device and art known to stagecraft to make his outdoor scene look like outdoors. And here, where we had color, and speech and special lighting and the glamour of a great play, greatly acted, so sustain the spell we were under, he succeeded in convincing us. The girl and her lover were real people—really going away, really amidst the mountains. But in this Reliance ending there was nothing to convince. The scenery was obviously scenery —and poor at that. The moving picture has neither color nor speech. And the ending failed utterly; chopped off, it would leave a film the better for the pruning. And it is the more remarkable that a mind that could conceive and execute that tepee scene—remarkable and beautiful as it is—could perpetrate such an offense against common sense and good taste as that wretched ending.

I had some disagreeable things to say about Kalem, recently, didn't I? Well, I ran across their "Grandma's War tale" the other day—the story of the Confederate wire tapper, and justice compels me to say that this was as good as Slim Jim" was bad. The war story is old, I believe—it was rainy film, but it was not so scarred but that one could nd good scenery, simple, convincing acting and genuine eart interest—and the beginning, of Grandma telling the tory which dissolved slowly into the story, and the ending, hen the story dissolved back into Grandma and her little udience, was both effective and pretty.

Edison, always sterling in comedy efforts, offers "Josh nd Cindy's Wedding Trip." A bit overdrawn on the part f Josh, who is quite too Reubenized a Reuben to be really nvincing, but so daintily done by the capable, pretty and ainty little girl who plays Cindy, this cross-section of real fe is very refreshing. The two, married, come to the city, ad a pocket-book of money, try, separately, to spend some t it on each other, are arrested for passing counterfeit bills, d released by a magistrate whom they have befriended earlier in the play. The comedy, a bit obvious and coming close to farce at times, the story was nevertheless true, to the audience, and there was considerable quiet laughter at several of the scenes.

I saw also a Biograph yesterday which isn't a Biograph standard at all—"His Sister-in-Law"—in which a pathetic little figure of a little girl, finding she is not wanted in her sister's new home, and by her sister's new husband, goes back to Aunty. One wonders why this story was pictured. It makes the man out a brute, the loving elder sister a weakling, the little girl an unhappy child, and leaves the audience hanging in mid-air, for no one knows how it comes out—unless, indeed, the film I saw had been robbed of a closing scene. In any event, it is unpleasant, and the quarrel between husband and wife, over the child, caused by wifey having to go several times to attend her little sister, is too improbable to seem real—and so is the man's temper.

But there is one thing to be said of them all—in general. Compared to the films of a year ago—two years ago—there isn't a producer at work now who worked then who hasn't made marked strides forward, and the more pictures I see, the harder I look for imperfections at which to throw stones; for improbabilities to note and impossibilities to make fun of; the more I am convinced of the fact that the standard of taste and ability on the part of producer and actor and actress has risen as fast, or faster, than the standard of taste of the public which supports them, and that it is only very recently that audiences have begun to get such a grasp on the possibilities of the motion picture, the meaning of good photography and the ability to really and truly act, that they have commenced to demand of the producer a standard so high that he must strain himself in reaching it. Yet, when he reaches it—as he does sometimes—the result is an appreciation by the public which makes them call again, and yet again, for films bearing his mark—that appreciation which, in the end, is for him spelled $$$$$.

And all of him are gradually finding out the fact that not all of him recognized from the first—that it pays to produce only the best, only the first-class, only the really classically done films, be they scenic, dramatic, comedy or pathos.

Exhibitors' League Meeting.

A meeting of the Exhibitors' League was held at Columbus, Ohio, May 2nd, at the Southern Hotel. The meeting was called to order at 10:30 a. m. by President M. A. Neff. In the absence of Secretary C. C. Carter, of Cincinnati, Mr. F. M. Keeney of Cleveland was named to act temporarily. President Neff in his opening address outlined the work done and to be done in the future by the League. He gave an interesting account of the stopping of adverse legislation, which would have been very detrimental to the moving picture interest. He also urged the necessity of a national convention of moving picture exhibitors to be held at some convenient place.

The President appointed the following committees:

Committee on Emblem: H. C. Vestal, Ada, Ohio; W. Stansbury, Marion, Ohio; A. E. Brandonbury, Marion, Ohio.

Committee on Dues: W. A. Pittis, Conneaut, Ohio; Max Sterns, Columbus, Ohio; J. J. Huss, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Committee on Grievances: W. J. Simms, Cleveland, Ohio; J. H. Broomhal, Hamilton, Ohio; W. A. Pittis, Conneaut, Ohio; F. W. Tynes, Portsmouth, Ohio; A. E. Brandonbury, Marion, Ohio.

Committee on Arrangements for a National Convention: F. M. Kenney, Cleveland, Ohio; W. A. Ka-per, Cleveland, Ohio; Chas. Rehark, Sandusky, Ohio.

An address was given by Mr. W. A. Pittis, of Conneaut, on the work of the organization in Pennsylvania. He was followed by talks by Mr. Harrington, of Pittsburg, and also by Mr. John M. Bradlet, of Chicago. The committees having met, the emblem committee submitted a design which was accepted by the meeting. After a lengthy adjournment, the committee on dues advised that the initiation fee of $5.00 remain and dues to the amount of $2.00 per month be levied to be paid to the treasurer on the first of each month in advance, starting May 1st. On motion this report and advice were adopted.

A motion was adopted that any member who underhandedly employs or takes away any employee of another member, shall suffer a fine of not less than $10.00 for the first offense and expulsion from the League for the second.

The report of the treasurer, G. O. Dupuis, was read and also his resignation. Both were accepted, and a vote of thanks was extended to Mr. Dupuis for his excellent work in the interest of the League. Mr. J. J. Huss was then nominated and unanimously elected to serve as treasurer, and a committee of three—W. B. Gandy, Lima, Ohio; F. H. Staup, Delphos, Ohio; J. J. Huss, Cincinnati, Ohio—was appointed to audit the books.

It was moved that if any officer of the League missed three consecutive meetings his chair would be considered vacant and a new officer be elected. Following this rule a new second vice-president, Mr. F. M. Keeney, of Cleveland, was unanimously elected, and a new secretary, Mr. C. J. A. Kyle, of Lebanon, O., was elected. It was also regularly moved and seconded that any applicant for a position in a picture house, who has at any previous time been employed by a member of the League, be compelled to show a recommendation from such member before being employed.

The subject of a national convention of moving picture exhibitors was taken up, and a meeting called for August 1st, 1911, at Cleveland, Ohio, for the purpose of forming a national association.

It was decided to invite all exhibitors and organizations of exhibitors throughout the country to co-operate and attend the proposed convention, or at least to send delegates. Also, it was moved that any member in arrears of his dues for three months, stands suspension and his card of membership returned to the League until he is paid up. The meeting then adjourned to meet in Cleveland, August 1, 1911.

Pennsylvania Exhibitors in Line.

As the Ohio exhibitors, at their State convention held at Columbus, on Tuesday, May 2, 1911, has named Cleveland, Ohio, as the place to hold the national convention, and as the Pennsylvania exhibitors had previously named the Ohio city, now let our slogan be: On to Cleveland. Let the exhibitors gather there by the thousands and show to the world that we are business men and intend to conduct our business as men, and we intend to build our organization on a foundation of honest principles and put an end to the cut-throat system of competition, where one exhibitor sells a ticket for five cents, admitting to one house and gives a free pass or coupon to his or their other theater free. It is a common thing to see the exhibitors showing anywhere from two to six reels of film and sometimes one or two acts of vaudeville for five cents.

Now the sooner the business career of this class is at an end, the better for the moving picture business. We also say that two-thirds of the exhibitors' troubles are caused by the exhibitors themselves, and the only remedy is an organization that will only allow honest and sane competition; now we appeal to you who have the interest of the moving picture business at heart to get together and form a League to protect your interest; you know in organization is strength. Now don't delay. Organize and elect your delegates to the national convention at Cleveland, Ohio, August 1, 1911. From now on let your slogan be, "On to Cleveland," and if you want any information as to the organizing of a league, write to or call at our headquarters; we will only be too glad to help you. Now let us hear from you.

(Signed) F. J. HARRINGTON
Pres. of Exhibitors' League, Pennsylvania.

London Letter

By A. E. Taylor.

While there will, of course, always be a certain demand for the cowboy type of subject, the English patrons are getting a little tired of prairie scenery, red Indians, scalping, and chases and are looking for something better. There are, in fact, indications all round that if the picture theater is to last it must be supplied with a different sort of picture.

One of the great causes of the outcry against the Sunday picture show, for instance, is when the class of picture exhibited. The inane comics with which the market is flooded by manufacturers who seem to think that quantity is more essential than quality have caused thinking people to begin to say that the picture play is mere piffle, and writers have begun to express the opinion that those who attend picture shows are wanting there what is more lacking in intelligence.

What is wanted is more genuine industrial subjects that the exhibitor can put on on Sunday without raising the ire of the "unco-guid" and the clergy, whose opinions do count for something with the licensing authorities, and disregard for whose voices causes the authorities to legislate in a manner which calls forth the anathemas of exhibitors, who really have only themselves to blame for what occurs. If we could have a constant supply of good subjects I believe in time the Sunday Show would be allowed.

An apparatus which is capable of taking motion pictures of life on the bed of the ocean has just been completed by M. Andrez, a French photographer and inventor. The camera, which is enclosed in a waterproof frame, can be operated from a boat, the shutter covering the lens being automatically released. The whole apparatus is oblong in shape and is of sufficient weight to allow it to sink easily to the bed of the sea. The necessary illumination is supplied by a powerful electric lamp, the rays from which are projected from a powerful convex lens in front of the camera. Several hundred feet of film is wound on a spool in the body of the apparatus and this is released by an electrically controlled spring at the rate of ten feet a second. The entire operation can be controlled from a boat.

Some remarkable results have been obtained during recent experiments made on the French coast. Many wonderful sea plants growing in the sand, rock covered with varied types of shell fish, interesting chronological phenomena, and myriads of minute salt water fish are clearly depicted in one of the films taken with the aquaticeograph. Many improvements have yet to be made to the apparatus before the results are exhibited in public. I understand that the chief difficulty up to the present time has been the regulating of the film release and the matter of correct exposure. The inventor means to experiment shortly with a new pneumatic attachment by which the film will be released in a more regular manner.

The immense value of the cinematograph as an aid to astronomical research has been proved by Professor Stormer of Christiana, who has recently procured some remarkable photos of the Aurora Borealis. Previous attempts have always proved unsuccessful on account of the inadequate luminous intensity of the aurora. Prof. Stormer overcame this by employing a cinematograph objective one inch in diameter and two inches in focal distance. During the early part of last year he started on an expedition of investigation to Bossekop, and was successful in obtaining 400 photos of the aurora out of a total of 800. The time of exposure he gave varied from a fraction of a second to 20 seconds, according to the intensity of the light. These records are of the utmost value in obtaining measurements of the altitude of the auroras and for ascertaining their exact positions in space. The photos obtained give a remarkable idea of the formation and magnitude of the lights, which are depicted in varying intensities. At various points in the arc of light a more luminous spot is noticeable, whilst the brilliance of the entire rays is intensified by the surrounding darkness.

Powers Picture Plays.

When the warm sun came out last Friday afternoon, we began to think of an excuse to get away from the office. The ball game was a very strong feature, but, as all our grandmothers died long ago, we could not plausibly entertain that proposition. Then came a life-saving telephone message from Mr. Tommy Evans that saved the day. He invited us (Sherlocko and Watso) to visit the Powers Plant, and in that way we managed to get out of the office routine.

It is a long ride out to the Powers plant, because it is situated at 241st Street, which is very near the Mt. Vernon line. Some time before we reached there we realized that we were leaving the real city behind and getting out into the good old country, where trees grow and dandelions are to be seen intermixed with daisies and bull-frogs and other such harbingers of spring. Situated in this semi-civilized spot, we found a factory for making moving pictures, labeled very conspicuously "Powers Picture Plays." On the second floor, we found the presiding genius, Mr. Thomas Evans—the button pusher. An afternoon spent with Thomas Evans, the general manager of the Powers plant, is a good deal the same as an afternoon with Theodore Roosevelt, according to newspaper standards, because, when anyone comes to interview him, Mr. Evans proceeds to make the interviewer turn his interview by putting him through the drill.

Just as we had settled down to watch the heroine thwart the villain, we were summoned upstairs to look at a reel. Instead of one reel we found that we were in for several reels, but we did not mind that, as they were all good. From the Turkish bath of the projection room, we were hustled into a big touring automobile, which is seen in the half-tone herewith, and rushed around the open country to cool us off. That is why we have stiff necks at this moment. Pat Powers was conspicuous by his absence, but then we know that Pat only hits the high places and leaves the actual management to Mr. Evans, whose executive ability we admire very greatly, especially when he pushes all the buttons at once.

The mechanical equipment in the studio is ideal. Direct current for the studio is generated on the premises by means of a motor generator set of a very large size. This furnishes the current for perfect installation of Cooper-Hewitt Mercury lights, which cover the scene effect in a way that would resemble a tent or shed. By this method there are no extraneous shadows anywhere in the picture.

Seated on his throne beside the camera, we had the pleasure of observing that very dynamic producer, Mr. Frances Powers. There is enough pent up energy in this one gentleman for a dozen men. We do not remember having seen a more particular man in our lives than Mr. Powers when directing a scene. His microscopic eye sees at a glance the defects that are absolutely invisible to the naked eye. In one case, he spent an hour over such a simple matter as the entrance of two actors through a door, the actual performance of which in the film occupied less than one minute.

In the illustration herewith we see Mr. Powers striking a dramatic attitude just prior to our little spin. There was no occasion for his doing such a thing, but he was so full of vinegar that he just could not help it. On the front seat of the auto is Thomas "Napoleon" Evans, the "William A. Brady" of the film production business.

We spent a great afternoon at the Powers plant. The ball game was very soon forgotten as we made our way through the different departments of the plant; they were all so instructive and entertaining that the afternoon went very quickly. The carpenter shop was humming with work, and the scenic painters plodded on industriously regardless of the audible scream of the heroine as she pleaded with the villain to spare the life of "Jack." Of course, everybody will know who we mean by "Jack"; whoever heard of a hero by another name? When the day was over and the actors were ringing up on the time clock on their way out, we took our places in one of the Powers' latest passenger automobiles and were shot like a bullet from the land of billy-goats back to civilization with speed enough to take our breath away. That is the speed of the Powers Plant.

Thomas H. Ince.

Among prominent actors who have forsaken the legitimate for the silent drama and of the few who have developed into moving picture directors of distinction is Thomas H. Ince, identified with the Independent Moving Picture Company of America. Mr. Ince has been prominent in the theatrical business all his life and comes of a very well known theatrical family. His connection with the Imp Company is not of very long standing, and he has only been directing for the company since last October; yet it is to his credit to say that since then he has turned out some of the best work ever seen under the "Imp" trademark, such as "The Drama," "The First Understudy," "The Usher's Maid," "Messages in the Bottle," "Sweet Memories," etc. Of an idealistic temperament and a studious nature he refuses to instil an individuality into Imp pictures, reserving his own personality and reveals sincere effort to invest the photoplay with a dignity and realism which is too often lacking.

Exhibitors' Meeting At Columbus, Ohio—National League Proposed.

By John M. Bradlee.

A National Convention of motion picture exhibitors is no more a problematic question but it is an assured fact, and, with a well attended convention, it is safe to predict much good for the business. The meeting of the Exhibitors' League of Ohio, held in Columbus, O., on May 2, sounded the doom of the present deplorable system and opened the way to much needed reforms.

The Exhibitors' League of Ohio does not represent the majority of the exhibitors throughout the country, nor the majority of the Ohio exhibitors, but if it is only a small band of men, they are, at least, moved by the spirit of 1776 and, with a will that nothing could stop, they have worked hard to conquer the first place. Their admirable work to free the exhibitor from the arbitrary rules of the exchanges and their work to curb unfair and unjust legislation has been recognized. The exhibitors who laughed at the struggle of a few pioneers, enlist to-day without any solicitation, and ask advice from their Ohio brothers, promise them their support and organize themselves for the same general purpose.

The meeting of May 2nd at Columbus was the best conducted and most orderly meeting ever held. The members present were not the unfair exhibitors, trying to ruin each other, but honorable men with a good will towards their competitors and ready to make a personal sacrifice for the good cause; men that can see the great future of motion pictures and willing to sacrifice part of the present for the sake of the future. With such sound business men, of education and intelligence, the meeting was devoid of all foolish talk and each question was treated in a business-like manner.

The presence of Mr. Fred J. Herrington, of Pittsburgh, Pa., a delegate from the Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania, revived the courage of some of the Ohio members. The members present realized that their work had not been in vain, when President Neff read a very encouraging letter from some Oregon exhibitors and when Mr. Herrington said that he had not been sent to Columbus to claim the National Convention for a Pennsylvania town, but that his mission was to inform the members of the Ohio Exhibitors' League of what work the Pennsylvania exhibitors were doing and to vote on Cleveland for the National Convention of 1911.

After hearing so many promises of support, the members of the Ohio Exhibitors' League decided that they could not drop the work and that their duty was to go forward and make of the proposed convention a great success for the benefit of all concerned.

Although Chicago could offer better advantages for a National Convention, we believe that no other place than Cleveland could be selected, as it is only just and fair that the Ohioans be rewarded for their good work by holding the convention in an Ohio town.

Some persons have an idea that a trade paper is nothing else than an advertising sheet or a list of releases. While this can be the case with certain publications, it is different with the Moving Picture World—it is read from cover to cover. If such was not the case, it would be impossible to find the sentiments for a national convention and an open market so well rooted in the mind of the exhibitor. A trade paper like a daily newspaper, moulds the mind of the reader. We find the ideas advocated by the Moving Picture World in the letters from the Pacific coast, in the delegation from Pennsylvania, and if it had not been for the policy of the paper, to urge a National Convention, we would not see the exhibitors of the United States so busy reorganizing associations, forming new leagues, etc., all with the same purpose of taking an active part in the coming National Convention.

The Exhibitors of Chicago have informed the writer that they were going to hold a meeting, to co-operate in the work. A gentleman from Milwaukee added much encouragement in announcing the formation of a League of the exhibitors of Wisconsin. We know that New York is also agitating the question.

The exhibitors realize that as long as they are allowed to spend vast sums of money in the building of beautiful houses or remodeling of their places, they must be at liberty to show what pictures they want and not be forced to show any pictures that the exchanges want to palm off on them. It seems ridiculous that when an exhibitor spends $50,000 on a new house, engages the best operator, the most polite ushers, talented musicians, etc., that he cannot select his program, to have pictures to suit his patronage. Some pictures like "The Priestess of Carthage"—"The Fall of Troy"—"Aida"—"Nero"—etc., will draw a selected patronage, while other pictures like "The Man Turning Dog"—"O, You Skeleton!"—"Golden Gates"—"Two Mothers"—etc., will kill the patronage of the best house. Is it not reasonable that when an exhibitor makes an investment of some $50,000 he should be allowed to select his program and reject the pictures not suitable for his place. Such is not the case. The exhibitor with a $50,000 theater is no better treated than the exhibitor with a $500 store-show; both are at the mercy of the renter, and the only excuse of the renter is that he must make so much money out of every film, bad or good. It is also true that if the renter was free to buy just what he wants, he could give a better service.

We know that the "Fall of Troy" is the greatest film offered, and we know that the small renter cannot buy it and that large renters do not take many copies. The policy of the Sales Co. is to curb the sales of the "Fall of Troy" and force the renters to buy more freely of the cheaper productions released by the members of the Sales Co. If the Sales Co. was animated with a true and sincere desire to uplift the industry and place the Independents at the top of the ladder, they would sell the "Fall of Troy" at the regular rates and all the copies possible.

It is high time for the exhibitors to league themselves against such arbitrary tactics. Start to work, organize locals, unite these locals into State Leagues. The State Leagues will meet at Cleveland next August and there form a National Body. A National League can accomplish wonders and the National League must be one of exhibitors only.

As I named the "Fall of Troy," I wish to show what an open market can do for the uplifting of motion pictures. The Lyric Theater, of Cincinnati, O., a regular playhouse with a seating capacity of 2,000 chairs, opened with motion pictures for the summer season. Messrs. McMahan & Jackson, the managers, decided to give a great opening with the "Fall of Troy" for one solid week. Messrs. McMahan & Jackson are progressive; they do not believe in the foolish arguments of other exhibitors; they have no fear of repeaters; they do not believe in daily changes; but, as sensible managers, they judge the picture and see if same can stand several days. The "Fall of Troy," released on April 15th, is no more considered a first run. It is to many extent a old picture and out of date. Messrs. McMahan & Jckson did not stop to consider if the "Fall of Troy" was over two weeks old; did not bother their mind if said film had already been shown in several theaters of Cincinnati, but they decided that if even the "Fall of Troy" was a repeater, it was good enough to hold the boards at the Lyric Theater for a solid week. Some exhibitors call it "nerve"; others call it "foolishness," and many competitors predicted a flat failure for the Lyric Theater.

Messrs. McMahan & Jackson knew what they were doing; they were confident, and they have made a great success as every day of the week they have shown the "Fall of Troy" to crowded houses. On Thursday, May 4th, the writer visited the Lyric. He could not find a seat on the ground floor and had to be satisfied with a side seat on the balcony. The success has been such that if Messrs. McMahan & Jackson do not yield to the general request, to show the "Fall of Troy" for a second week, the Sun Theater will make arrangements to secure the film for a week.

The exhibitor has suffered much at the hands of the manufacturer. Sensational and badly acted dramas, stupid comedies, etc., have discouraged the public, have excited the press and the clergy against motion pictures, and it would be only justice to give the exhibitor the full benefit of such pictures as the "Fall of Troy."

The Licensed folks had also a feature film in the "Priestess of Carthage," of Gaumont. Do we hear of the "Priestess of Carthage?" No. Mr. George Kleine made a mistake to release the picture as an ordinary release, and for the reason—the "Priestess of Carthage" followed the same circuit as the "Two Mothers." One day the Orpheum, of Chicago, showed the "Two Mothers" to a disgusted audience; another day they showed the "Priestess of Carthage" to a delighted audience. In the course of a few weeks, the "Priestess of Carthage" will rest on the same shelf with the "Two Mothers," and this without having been shown for several consecutive days, or of having been repeated. With the present system of rentals, an exhibitor could not show the "Priestess of Carthage" for a week, as the General Film Co. does not buy enough prints and everything is scheduled in advance. Jones is to receive the film on Monday, Smith on Tuesday, Black on Wednesday, etc. To grant the film a second day to an exhibitor would upset all the system.

With an open market, the exchanges would be at liberty to buy many prints of the "Priestess of Carthage," "Fall of Troy," "Aida," "Nero," etc., and refuse copies of "O, You Skeleton," "Man Turning Dog," "The Two Mothers," etc. If the master productions were shown and the bad films rejected, the investment of the exhibitor would be profitable

Los Angeles.

By Richard V. Spencer.

New Producer.—Los Angeles is soon to be headquarters for another new producing company. The new company is incorporated under the name of The Co-operative Film Manufacturing Company, with a capital stock of $50,000, most of which is said to have been subscribed with the idea of making it a close corporation. D. Daniels, the secretary of the company, states that the company holds non-infringing camera patents. Mr. Daniels is also the inventor of an improved system of indoor studio light bateries with which the studio of the company is equipped.

The secretary declined to give any specific information regarding the officers of the corporation at this time, other than to say that the men behind the company are men that have had many years of experience in the producing and business managing end of the moving picture business. The company's dramatic director and most of the stock company have been chosen and several films have already been produced at the offices and studio of the company at 749-51 S. Broadway, Los Angeles. Arrangements are now under way for the marketing of the company's films under the trade mark of Fox Brand Films. It is the intention of the company to undertake the various kinds of film work, including Dramatic, Comedy, Scenic, Industrial, Educational and Advertising work. Arrangements are now being made to go to work on a large scale early in June.

Bison.—Mr. Montgomery, the Bison dramatic editor, and members of the Bison Stock Company, spent several days last week near Azuza, in the canyon of the San Gabriel, working on Western pictures. The Selig Company also recently took a film in the same vicinity. The north fork of the San Gabriel River, on which the views were taken, flows through some of the wildest and most rugged mountain scenery to be found in the Southwest.

Selig.—The Selig Company seems bent upon cornering the stage coach market. They have just purchased a second of these relics of the old Southwest. Mr. Bosworth, director, recently journeyed to Banning and purchased the old Banning coach. Forty years ago saw the same stage coach rolling across the torrid desert wastes between San Bernardino and Yuma with its freight of passengers and mail. The scars of the old coach could tell many a tale of the old time road agent, of wrecks and runaways on narrow mountain trails; of perils by flood, and desert wastes, and each one would, doubtless, provide the subject for an interesting and thrilling scenario, could they be read. Of late years, the old coach has been idle, but will now be repaired, repainted and put back into commission, and by the aid of the camera will show the younger generation how their forefathers traveled over the West in "The days of old, the days of gold, the days of '49."

Biograph.—The Biograph Company is making arrangements to return to their Eastern studio. They will leave Los Angeles about May 15th. Rumors regarding the company are flying thick and fast in the local moving picture colony, but owing to the peculiar publicity policy of the company, it is impossible to verify them. One rumor is to the effect that the Biograph Company are about to divide the company, leaving one of their directors and a stock company here to work the year around, while the other company works in the East.

Kalem.—The Kalem Company is said to be so well satisfied with the work of their Western company and with California scenic settings that their studio at Glendale will be made permanent.

Miss Virginia Chester, ingenué with the Pathe Company, is again on the sick list. Miss Chester had just recovered from a month's serious illness, when she contracted appendicitis. She was taken to the Clara Barton Hospital and on the 24th was operated upon.

Pathe.—The Pathe Company will leave on May 5th for Tia Juana, on the Mexican line, where they will make several films. A scenario on which they are working requires a real bull fight. This scene will be filmed in the bull ring at Tia Juana. Among the members of the company going on the southern trip are Mr. James Young Deer, director; Chas K. French, assistant manager; Fred W. Gollum, business manager; Joseph DeGrasse, Margaret W. Manners, Vola Ramon, and a number of others.

Red Wing (who in private life is known as Mrs. James Young Deer), who plays Indian leads in Pathe Western stories, and who has been absent for several months visiting in New York City, is expected back this week.

Miss Vida Ramon, a talented San Francisco girl, formerly connected with a San Francisco moving picture company, has joined the Pathe Company, to play alternate leads.

Miss Bessie Eyton, formerly appearing in Pathe West Coast productions, has left the latter company and gone to the Selig Company, with whom he has signed a contract.

Selig Second Company To Go North.—Mr. Hobart Bosworth, director, and half of the Selig Company are shortly to leave for the Yosemite Valley. The company worked in the valley and vicinity last summer for a period of several months, getting what was afterwards declared to be the finest group of scenic-dramatic films ever taken in the West. The company will take with them the recently purchased Banning stage coach. During their absence, Mr. Boggs, general manager and director, will remain at the local studio with the other half of the company.

Dave Morris, a former member of local legitimate stock companies, is the latest recruit to join the moving picture end of the profession. He will henceforth appear in important character parts with the Pathe West Coast Stock Company, with whom he has signed a contract.

Lobbying Against State Bill.—Los Angeles and San Francisco film exchanges, both Licensed and Independent, together with prominent exhibitors in all parts of the State, have for some time past maintained a lobby of lawyers and representatives at Sacramento to defeat the amended Strobridge Bill. The bill, as amended and passed by both the Senate and Assembly, will, if signed by the Governor, become a law, which, when enforced will work untold hardships upon exhibitors throughout the State who have been showing Western films. W. H. Hodkinson, local manager for The General Film Company, has gone to Sacramento to fight against the bill. The Los Angeles Exhibitors Association have forwarded to their attorney at Sacramento a petition of protest to the Governor. The petition was signed by 75 exhibitors, members of the Los Angeles association. The petition sets forth the complaint that should the bill become a law it will work a great hardship upon exhibitors and the general public. The bill came up for the Governor's signature on April 30th, but the Governor has put it forward to another date.

Arthur S. Hyman has returned from his recent business trip to San Francisco.

Shell.—Last week featured the big Itala film, "The Fall of Troy," and drew big houses.

Ideal.—Spring Street, between 3rd and 4th Streets, last week featured Miles' Brothers' San Francisco Earthquake film, and did a rushing business.

Metropolitan.—Main Street, opposite the Plaza, has gone Independent. They have cut down their admission fee to five cents to all parts of the house.

Family.—Main Street, between 4th and 5th Streets, are this week featuring the Buffalo Bill pictures to capacity.

Wonderland.—315 S. Main Street, is having its box office repainted and decorated.

Lyric.—The new Spring Street theater that opened last week has sprung a novelty upon Western theater-goers. They are showing pictures only, between 10 a. m. and 1 p. m., and between 5 and 7 p. m., for a five-cent admission. Between 7.30 and 10.30, both pictures and vaudeville are shown for a ten-cent admission. This style of motion picture theater management is new to Los Angeles, and local exhibitors will watch with interest results from a box office point of view.

Fire Department to Control M. P. Theater Exits.—The fire commissioners decided May 1st to advise the City Council to put the inspection of theater exits under the exclusive control of the fire department. The Board was shown, in a recent petition to the Council, asked for a better system in the enforcement of the fire ordinance. The theater managers assert that there are now three different city departments who are working independently to enforce the ordinance, with the result that there is much confusion, since one department often orders things done which another department or new days later cancels.

Incorporation.—Articles of incorporation were filed recently by the I. A. Ellis Amusement Company. Directors: I. A. Ellis, Almyra Paxton, and F. F. Hahn. Capital stock $20,000; subscribed, $300.

Ardent Picture "Fan."—The Los Angeles Police Department has found a new use for moving picture theaters. Hereafter, when lost children are picked up on the beats of officers, instead of taking them to police headquarters, officers are likely to take them to picture shows to entertain them charges until called for. Heretofore the police officers and matrons have been at their wits end to keep their temporary charges from wailing for their parents. Questions, as a rule, had to elicit satisfactory replies as to parents or home or house. Others of peanuts, popcorn, ice cream and other childish luxuries, only bring forth louder cries and demands for mamma. Patrolman Wallace, of the Los Angeles force, is the father of the new idea.

New England.

Mr. Fred Hannen has acquired the controlling interest in the opera house, Sanford, Maine, which he will run with moving pictures and vaudeville. Mr. Hannen, or, as he is better known as the "moving picture king, of Maine," formerly operated the Knights of Pythias Hall in Sanford. He is interested in moving picture theaters in many cities and towns throughout the whole State of Maine. He has the knack of always picking winners, therefore the Opera House will no doubt be a money-maker for the "King."

Messrs. Mayer and Morris have given up the Broadway Theater, Lawrence, Mass., and the house has been acquired by Messrs. Frankel and Connelly, of Lynn, Mass. The house will probably run Licensed pictures and vaudeville under the new proprietors.

The construction of a large auditorium in Providence, R. I., to be used as a combination skating rink, convention hall and theater, is being considered by Providence people. The promoters are now considering plans for the consummation of the project. According to information, the building will be 300 feet by 170 feet, with a total seating capacity of over 5,000 people. It is certain that if the building is erected that ample space is to be left for a moving picture booth.

The Nickel Theater, of Bangor, Maine, which has been doing a very steady business this winter, was totally wiped out by the big conflagration which visited Bangor on Sunday, April 30. The house is to be rebuilt on a larger and more elaborate scale, according to the promoters of the Nickel.

Messrs. Chas. E. Cook and "Mike" R. Sheedy have acquired the Taunton Theater, Tauton, Mass., which they opened April 24, with their usual programs of "pop" vaudeville and pictures. "Mike" Sheedy, always an active figure in New England moving picture affairs, has recently taken up a rate of speed unusual even for him, and nearly every week something new is being financed by the indefatigable "Mike." Mr. Cook is not far behind Mr. Sheedy, and is usually connected with him on new ventures.

The Star Theater, Dover, formerly the Clements Theater, closed Saturday. Six concerns have taken a hand at running the Star within a year. None of them seemed able to show anything better than a loss on their venture. Mr. Jack Dolan, proprietor of the Lyric, Dover, continues to play to houses which have "standing room only." Such instances as these are very common throughout New England. Mr. Dolan has always delivered the goods at his Lyric, and has the support of the inhabitants of the town, who show their appreciation of good pictures and vaudeville by sticking to the Lyric when opposition opens.

The old Union Hill Theater, of Pittsfield, Mass., which was recently taken over by Messrs. Hennocksburg and Wesley, and renamed the Globe Theater, is no longer being operated by that concern. The house is now being run by Messrs. Lothrop and Tolman, as a moving picture and vaudeville house, under the old name of the Union Hill Theater. Mr. Elmer Walters was house manager for Hennocksburg & Wesley. There seemed to be some hitch over the lease of the theater and other minor details, which are assigned as the reasons for this change of ownership.

The Managers' Protective Association, of Providence, R. I., held their benefit performance at the Empire Theater, April 28, as has already been noted in these columns. A large sum of money was taken in and was turned over to the Bulletin Tree Fund, for the planting of trees in Providence. The benefit was a big success, and received enthusiastic approval of Providence people. Mr. Charles Lovenberg, President of the Association, was to be seen leading the large orchestra during the performance.

Mr. F. Wotton has had a successful opening of his new moving picture theater at Waltham, Mass. Mr. Wotton refitted the old Endicott Hall, and renamed his house the Orpheum Theater. Manager Wotton was formerly connected with the Comique Theater, Malden, Mass. The house is exhibiting Independent pictures and songs.

Messrs. Ashley and Asher, of Boston, are soon to open the old Relay Theater, Nahant, Mass., which will be renamed as the Knickerbocker. During the hot months, vaudeville and pictures will be presented. The chances strongly favor Independent service from the W. E. Greene Film Exchange, of Boston.

Mr. William Cook will soon open a new moving picture theater near Northampton, Mass. The house will probably run pictures and songs, with no vaudeville.

The warm weather is already affecting the New England theaters, and, from now on, many closings over the hot months are sure to be in evidence.

HENRY.

Boston.

As predicted in these columns, the Globe Theater, Washington Street, has returned to the fold of junior vaudeville and moving pictures. The house opened under this policy Sunday, May 7, with admission throughout the house at ten cents. Licensed pictures are shown. The Premier has pasted up the five cent admission signs, as it is always forced to do when the Globe starts the picture game. A large, beautifully appointed regular theater as is the Globe has a tremendous start over the regular moving picture theater, even when it is a first-class one like the Premier, and seriously cripples the trade of the smaller house, especially when they are situated side by side, as is the case in Boston.

The New England Trust Company has brought suit in the superior court for an injunction to restrain the Automatic Vaudeville Company and others from erecting an electric advertising sign upon the roof of the building at 680 and 682 Washington Street. The Automatic Vaudeville Company, of New York, operates the Premier Theater in this building, and holds the lease on the property. The trust company claims that the sign is being operated in violation of the lea e.

Cleveland.

Metropolitan dailies are beginning to realize that the motion picture has devotees by the million whose good or ill will has at least a potential effect in the ledger and circulation records, and that a little space devoted to news of the photoplay stage is better than any amount of space filled with knocks on the picture. The Cleveland Leader is one of the first to recognize the interests of the motion picture "fan," and has won a host of new friends through the department, besides pleasing old friends.

The Leader began by running a contest in which cash prizes were given for the best criticism of pictorial dramas seen during the current week. The Metropolitan section of the same paper each Sunday contains an article of some kind, illustrating or commenting upon some phase of the amusement in Cleveland.

The latest innovation of The Leader is to publish in its copper-plate section, along with portraits of the famous actors of the country, pictures of the leading photoplayers. Other big city papers are going into the subject in a less elaborate way, but undoubtedly The Leader's example will ultimately be followed by all the live papers, when they are brought to see that the millions of people who actually pay for the privilege of seeing the pictures, good, bad and indifferent, are naturally interested in the people whose images they see in the photoplays.

Musically, Cleveland photoplay houses, with some few exceptions, are not all that they could be. Mechanical "piano-orchestras" are used considerably but injudiciously. Rag time and popular songs that have frivolous meanings often spoil good pictures when used indiscriminately and always play havoc with pathetic or strong dramatic pieces. Where mechanical pianos are used for the overtures, it is better to keep within their limitations by using only rolls of standard music, such as "Poet and Peasant," "Oberon," "William Tell." Such pieces as these are dignified enough to play for any drama, and there is still enough life in them to brighten up a comedy.

Experiments are being made by a local chemist to perfect a screen which, through the use of a phosphorescent coating, will hold the projected picture after the arc has been turned off. It is claimed that, thus far, success is dependent only upon finding the proper compound to prevent the successive pictures running into each other, with consequent blurring. In short, the reflection lasts too long. The possibilities of the idea, in the absolute prevention of flicker with any type of shutter at almost any speed, are easily understood.

The Independent faction appears to have the better of the argument for business here. With the exception of the vaudeville houses, in which the picture is secondary, only three downtown photoplay theaters use "dominant interest" films, against eight Independent shows.

The Lewis Amusement Company, operating the Princess, Corona and Orpheum theaters, uses trust pictures in the latter house only.

Itala's "Fall of Troy" has been shown in some downtown house continuously since its release, to good business. The Great Northern "Hamlet" was on the program with it at the Princess Theater Monday, April 17. At the Mall, the Itala masterpiece was kept a full week.

Photoplays formed the entire bill at Keith's Hippodrome the first half of the week of April 17, Metropolitan Grand Opera holding the stage the last half.

B. G. DRUMMOND.

Chicago.

The American Film Service, at 79 Clark Street, has rented a ground floor office at 429 Wabash Avenue, near Congress Street. Van Ronkel says it's going to be something like his old place in the Security Building that burned out two years ago and was considered the finest office of a film exchange in the United States.

The Anti-Trust Film Company, formerly located at 79 Clark Street, has moved to new and spacious quarters at 128 Lake Street.

Eugene Cline has left the old office at 59 Dearborn Street, his headquarters for the last ten years, and is now located in the Temple Court Building at 219 South Dearborn Street.

The Globe Film Service, at 108 Madison Street, has removed to the Northwestern Building, Lake Street and Fifth Avenue.

Mr. A. Hyman, of the Janet Theater, is building a new picture house on 2800 Milwaukee Avenue seating 300.

New house on 55th and Ashland Avenue, Mr. Shell, proprietor and manager, seats 300. Pictures only.

The Royal Theater, formerly the old Howard Theater on Lincoln and Belmont Avenues, is to be torn down to make room for a new modern vaudeville house.

Marcus Loew and Wm. Morris were in town stopping at the Sherman House. A representative of the Moving Picture World called and interviewed Mr. Loew in regard to the object of his Chicago trip and his intentions of any new enterprises in the motion picture field. Mr. Loew assured us it was nothing stirring in our line and that his visit was purely in the interest of his vaudeville houses.

Ed. Miller, formerly business manager of the Essanay Manufacturing Company, also with Lieber in Indianapolis, leaves the city in a few days for the Coast to represent the Canadian Film Exchange, of Calgary, Alberta, B. C., in Seattle and Vancouver.

Texas and the Southwest.

Men and women who have been riding and romping and posing and acting before the moving picture camera in and about the Hot Wells Hotel, composing the Star Film Ranch, left San Antonio April 22. The company is the only one of the G. Melies & Co., and since October last has been in San Antonio making from one to five moving picture films a week. The company will go to Santa Barbara, California, where it can obtain ocean and mountain scenes.

During its stay in San Antonio, the Melies Company has produced some of the best Western pictures anywhere. San Antonio's scenery offers itself realistically to the settings of Western picture plays. The Star Film Ranch Company has done splendid work in and about the old Missions and along the San Antonio River.

The members of the company left many friends in San Antonio who will watch the local moving picture shows for the coming of the Melies pictures from California. Following is the personnel of the company: G. Melies, president; Mrs. G. Melies, manager and dramatic critic; Francis Ford, assistant manager; Mrs. Ford, William Clifford, William A. Carroll, Henry Stanley, Mrs. Stillings, Miss Stillings, Ben Cooper, Charles Cooper, William Gettinger, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Young, Miss Fannie Midgely, Mrs. Hall, Mr. and Mrs. Bracken, Mr. and Mrs. William Paley, Mr. and Mrs. Jean Bardebegiere, Otto Mayer and Miss J. Anna Nichols.

Miss Edith Storey, familiarly known as Billy, the central figure of many of the San Antonio pictures, and her mother, Mrs. Storey, went to New York for three months, after which they joined the company in Santa Barbara.

As a test case, the Waco, Tex., authorities required W. L. Linkenfelder and three of his employees to give bond to answer to a charge of violation of the law, by running a moving picture show on Sunday. The defendants were arrested and, after giving bond, they reopened the show and were not again molested. Mr. Linkenfelder says he feels that he was within his rights in running the show on Sunday, as he exhibited practically nothing but Scriptural scenes. The Sunday before, he exhibited the "Passion Play" and was not molested. He says his attorney advised him that Holy Land views and views based on the narratives of the New Testament can be legally shown on Sunday, in any community. One of the films was a prohibition picture designed to show the evils of strong drink.

Able lawyers have been employed by the defendants and it is understood that the corporation attorney will be assisted by counsel employed by opponents of moving picture show exhibitions on Sunday, without any regard to the character of the pictures.

Dr. C. W. Trueheart, city health officer of Galveston, Tex., has enlisted the aid of the moving picture in the war against the housefly, and the department will purchase a copy of the film which shows the dangers of the little insect.

The Savoy Amusement Company, of Muskogee, Okla., has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $15,000. The directors are George P. McNerney, Mayme McNerney and Edward J. McNerney, all of Muskogee.

Dr. A. O. Scarborough is building a new opera house at Snyder, Tex.

The Aubert Amusement Company has been incorporated at St. Louis, Mo., with a capital stock of $10,000. The incorporators are Elmer Candy, Ray M. Ellers and John W. Calhoun.

Washington, D. C.

Another manager who has recently "cut out" cheap vaudeville from the motion picture theater is J. P. Morgan, who lately succeeded to the control of the Princess. Realizing that vaudeville was a losing game, he is using now one good singer, Mr. Hawkins, and high-class pictures. "Already finances are increasing," said Manager Morgan. "You can't fool the public into believing that they can see good artists at a five-cent show. They know better."

One of our pretty, but small, down-town theaters is the Maryland, under the management of William Alvine, who can be found at all times about the premises. His motto is: If you want to be sure a thing is done in the best possible way, go do it yourself. This house runs five and six reels daily, using good accompanying music. The manager extends especial courtesy to the ladies and children, who have accordingly become his chief patrons. Photoplays of the comedy and cheerful sort are the chief attraction of the Maryland, with occasionally educational reels.

Jos. L. Marentette, of Baltimore, is the new local manager of the Washington Film Exchange (Independent). Since Mr. Lucas will be on the road a good part of the time, Mr. Marentette will have almost complete charge of affairs in this city.

"The Flea Circus," a unique film made by the Capital Film Company of this city, had a most successful run at the Metropolitan for three days. The fact that this was placed in one of our most neglected districts, and was able to raise finances considerably with increased prices, speaks well for the drawing powers of this novelty. Prof. Nokes, who has trained the fleas shown on the screen, made some explanatory remarks which added much to the understanding of the performance. Scientists, men and women of higher education, and skeptics were in large numbers and did not hesitate to make favorable comment on the film.

The phenomenal run of the "Fall of Troy" at the Empress and the Maryland, for two days being presented simultaneously, did not satisfy this city, and Manager Nokes had to give it a return-engagement at the Empress. The musical accompaniment which this film was given could scarcely have been excelled in a stage production. Manager Nokes is issuing a neat souvenir in the form of postals of "Little Mary" of the Imp Company. This house makes a specialty of advertising its program of manufacturers to be shown during the week and thereby advertising the films in preference to the photo-plays. Three reels on the first day of their release forms the daily show. The scoop that Manager Notes secured on the presentation of the Fall of Troy has been the cause of amusing comment.

Manager Tom Moore, of the General Film Exchange, is again in his office after an absence of several weeks in the South. Of course he had to go to New York before returning. Both himself and Mrs. Moore have been much benefited by the vacation.

Manager W. P. Herbst, of the Circle, has one of the finest houses of the west end of the city. His recent presentation of the Destruction of the Battle-ship San Marcos brought to his house an exceptionally large crowd, of which scientific and scholarly men composed no small part.

The "Senate," under the management of Louis K. Kerby, plays an important part in the Capital Hill section of the city. Always offering its patrons good music, there is a special musical program twice a week, which its patrons find very attractive.

Manager Braswell, of the Royal, continues the good work of keeping up with the name of his theater. One is sure to have a royal time with prizely comfrey and ice pictures from exclusive vaults.

The Aeme uses three feature reels, excluding commercial reels entirely. In this manner it aims to appeal to the intelligent and uplift the less cultured. "It aims to have the best," said the manager, "but it also pays cost to return. By some hitch my reels did not arrive in time to-day and I have just returned from a horseback trip to Philadelphia." The recent presentation of "Across the Mexican Line" made a timely feature of the Mexican situation.

W. H.

Louisville.

B. F. Keith's Mary Anderson Theater in Louisville adopted the photoplane of S. L. Rothapfel recently in its motion picture exhibitions at the close of the vaudeville shows. The photoplane permits the picture to be shown with the auditorium of the theater fully lighted, thereby removing the eyestrain on the part of spectators. B. F. Keith is installing the photoplane, for which he controls the patent rights held by Mr. Rothapfel, in every theater of the Keith circuit.

The building and police authorities of Memphis, Tenn., have cooperated to inspect moving picture theaters of that city in regard to the safety of exits and other features of public protection in the houses with the result that the Star, 129 North Main Street; the Savoy, 121 South Fourth Street, and the New Pekin, 98 South Fourth Street, were closed following orders from Building Inspector Dan C. Newton. The cause of Inspector Newton's action is that the theaters which have been closed have their entrance floors above the level of the sidewalk and three or four steps lead to the entrances and exits, which he declares is a dangerous arrangement in case of panic in the interior, when persons rushing out would fall down the steps and be trampled upon by those following. Inspector Newton stated that the houses were to be closed until his orders regarding the removal of the steps were complied with, but the management of the Star moving picture show secured an injunction from the court to restrain the authorities from preventing operation of the theater until the case could be tried on its merits. Further developments are pending.

It was recently announced that H. Fichtenburg, of New Orleans, La., has secured a location in Vicksburg, Miss., and is having plans prepared for a $25,000 moving picture theater in the Mississippi city. The new structure will be fireproofed throughout, two stories in height, and will have ornamentation and every modern improvement. The seating capacity will be about 1,000 persons. Wiliam A. Stanton, of Vicksburg, is the architect.

Desberger Brothers, who are now operating the Gem and Star motion picture theaters in Paducah, Ky., recently announced that they will erect an up-to-date and vaudeville house in the rear of the arcade building which is now in course of construction at Fifth Street and Broadway in Paducah. A roof garden in connection with the theater, where soft drinks may be dispensed, will be operated upon the roof of the arcade. Work of construction will be commenced at once upon the new show house and its completion within a few weeks is assured.

Riverview and Fontaine Ferry Parks, on the bank of the Ohio River in the extreme west end of Louisville, opened up last Sunday to provide open-air amusement for the public for several months to come. Riverview is managed by Col. Lum Simons, and Fontaine Ferry is operated by the Park Amusement Company. Both resorts are equipped with vaudeville theaters, at which two or three reels of motion pictures are included in each performance, while smaller auditoriums for straight picture exhibitions may be found at various places on the grounds. Opening day for the parks was, as usual, marked by a deluge from Jupiter Pluvius, but inasmuch as such a calamity is liable to be starting the ball rolling, the amusement managers are in no wise disconcerted and are looking forward to a big season.

John M. Ward, formerly manager of the Walnut Street Theater during its vaudeville and motion picture regime, opened the Avenue Theater, on Fourth Avenue between Green and Walnut Streets, last Sunday. The Avenue bill includes six vaudeville acts and four reels of high-class films, the admission rate being 10 cents. Manager Ward widely advertised the novel feature that 100 free seats were offered to the first 100 persons presenting themselves at the door of the Avenue to view the initial offering of the summer's run.

The Princess Amusement Company, with Irvin C. Simon as manager, will open the Gayety Theater, on Jefferson Street, between Third and Fourth Avenues, for a summer run of six vaudeville acts and three reels of associated films next Sunday. The Gayety price schedule will be 10 and 15 cents, such as Hopkins Theater is now operating under Princess control. The Princess concern has just completed the installation of a $1,700 system of exhaust and electric fans in the Gayety, which will insure a temperature approaching that of Klondike during the hot summer months, a feature which will be in itself a tremendous drawing card.

Business is reported to have been A-1 at the theaters Superba, Orpheum and Casino, controlled by the Princess Amusement Company. All of the Princess houses are receiving coatings of fresh paint to be in spick-and-span condition for the coming summer rush, and Manager Irvin C. Simon, who superintends the chain of Princess houses, now five altogether, in Louisville, has been compelled to make several short trips to Chicago during the past week or two providing for new sources of supply for films, et cetera, at the local establishments.

The Baxter Amusement Company, a corporation of which the Broadway Amusement Company is the parent, filed articles with the Secretary of State last week, placing its capital stock at $1,800, its purpose being to establish and conduct a moving picture airdome on Baxter Avenue, near Highland, in Louisville. The limit of indebtedness of the concern is placed at $3,000, and the following are named as incorporators: Edward Klapsheke, George Bousch and Frederick Kramer.

"The Baxter airdome will probably be in operation within the next month, while work upon the Ideal dome, at Twenty-third and West Market Streets, owned by the Ideal Amusement Company, is already well under way," said Joseph Steurle, of the Broadway Amusement Company. The Broadway concern embodies the stockholders of both the Ideal and Baxter companies, and operates the Broadway and West Broadway theaters in Louisville besides. The airdomes, when completed, will have a combined capacity of 3,000 persons, and Mr. Steurle stated that, in view of the success encountered by the Broadway houses during the past week or so, a big season is opening up for motion picture operators in general. The airdomes, it was stated, will run a bill consisting of four vaudeville acts and four reels of film, the admission rate being 10 cents.

Bernie McDevitt, formerly a well-known bookmaker, whose residence is at 2221 Cherokee Parkway, in Louisville, is establishing a company to operate an up-to-date moving picture theater at Seventh and Oak Streets, in Louisville. The location is admirable, in the heart of the section coloquially known as "Limerick," and a well-equipped house, such as Mr. McDevitt is planning, will undoubtedly have a successful career.

President L. J. Dittmar, of the Royal Amusement Company, which operates the Majestic and Royal showhouses in Louisville, says that business is well above standard at both of his "shops." Mr. Dittmar put on a novel stunt at the Royal, Eighteenth Street and Broadway, last week, which is making a tremendous hit with the patrons. The Royal's president secured the services of Dean Cornwell, one of the best known young artists in the city, in a quick sketching skit with the singer at the Royal. Mr. Cornwell appeared on one side of the stage, equipped with artist's paraphenalia while the singer appeared opposite and sang a popular song, the theme of which was illustrated in a rapid-fire manner by the artist. While the singer was rendering two verses of "Silver Bell," the Indian song, in two and one-half minutes, the wielder of the brush executed a handsome Indian's head upon his canvas, and so the program ran, down to the sketch of an old-fashioned bluegrass homestead, which accompanied the notes of "Home, Sweet Home," as the finale.

A touching heart-interest story, and what is more striking, a true one, which would do credit to the wildest dreams of the press agent, developed last week at the Globe Theater, at Twentieth Street, and Portland Avenue, in the west end residence section of Louisville. "Porland," as this section is commonly known, is made up of all sorts and conditions of residents and it developed that one of its habitants had been hauled before the city tribunal several times for mistreatment of his wife, most of the wife-beating having been committed while the defendant was considerably the worse for John Barleycorn. After one of his periodical tears and the aftermath of a fine in the police court, the man happened to drop in at the Globe and witnessed a film portraying just such a scene as he had often enacted at home. As the supplicating terror of the defenseless wife penetrated from the flickering rays on the canvas to the soul of the local offender, there was a heart-rending sob and the old ne'er-do-well was totally converted to the paths of rectitude by witnessing his own disgrace as graphically as could be possible. The incident was related by Will Hardy, manager of the theater.

Dr. G. W. Armes, superintendent of the Feeble-Minded Institute at Frankfort, Ky., recently visited Louisville and secured an up-to-date moving picture machine which is to be installed at the institute, which will be used in giving instructive and entertaining exhibitions to the unfortunates in the hope of re-collecting scattered wits through the medium of motion films.

An Arcade building with a roof garden upon which motion picture exhibitions will constitute the chief feature of summer amusement, is being erected at Fifth Street and Broadway, in Paducah, Ky. Max B. Nahm, of Bowling Green, Ky., is one of the prime movers in the project, and a summer run of strictly up-to-date attractions in the picture line will be given.

In the Mississippi Valley.

Holm & Weaver, of Belvidere, Ill., have named their new moving picture show the Star. Harold Packard is singer and Amos Hitchcock, pianist.

H. O. Talley, of Carlinville, has opened a moving picture show in the opera house at Greenfield, Ill. Clarence Wooley is operator; Miss Mary Foster, ticket seller; Lewis Estell, ticket taker, and Miss Clara Mung, pianist.

Lukey & Luker of Canton, Ill., who own the Dreamland and the Airdome theaters in that city, have leased the Grand Opera House in Canton and will operate it as a first-class moving picture theater, supplementing the current line of road attractions.

Rev. E. T. McFarland, pastor of Memorial Christian Church, of Rock Island, Ill., is planning to install a moving picture machine in the basement of the church and, by giving free tickets to those who attend the Sunday school, give to them a profitable exhibition of the best films. He also sees in this plan a means of getting many parents who are not especially interested in church work to attend and so bring them under church influence.

Bushy Brothers, of Marshalltown, Iowa, have decided to end the "legitimate" bookings at the Odeon Theater and give 3,000 feet of films and two vaudevile acts.

The Columbia Theater, of Evansville, Ind., has been incorporated, with the following drectors: Tina Skora, Phillip Skora and Phillip Raphael.

Fred and William Zur Welle and William Keller are building the Colonial Airdome at Illinois Avenue and Fourteenth Street, East St. Louis, Ill., which will feature moving pictures.

The Interstate Theatrical Association has purchased the Empress Theater at East St. Louis, Ill., from the Sullivan-Considine Company, and will substitute the photoplay for vaudeville.

Contract has been let for the new Princess Theater which Harris & Nicholson will erect at Beardstown, Ill., to be used as a high-class moving picture and vaudeville house.

The Rex Amusement Company, consisting of Messrs. Stanley, Nigg and Hawken, of St. Louis, have opened an airdome on North Morgan Street, Shelbyville, Ill.

Arthur Boggis, who recently purchased the Gem Moving Picture Theater, at Mt. Carmel, Ill., is having the place remodeled, a new front put in, and the seating capacity enlarged. The force connected with this house consists of A. R. Treichel, operator; Miss Mary Leighty, pianist; Peter Lennert, trap drummer, and Mrs. Elmer Woodling, singer.

T. O. Thomas, who recently sold the Gem, at Mt. Carmel, Ill., has negotiated for a vaudevile and picture theater in Eldorado, Ill.

Carl Sharrock, owner of the Vaudette Theater, Vandalia, Ill., has leased the Vandalia Opera House and will supplement the line of current theatrical attractions with a picture show.

Chatterton's Opera House, Springfield, Ill., is using two reels of film in connection with a summer stock company.

A Southern Illinois picture show recently advertised "The Lady with the Big Voice" as an attraction. The same place also gave rain checks to the patrons, entitling them to come again, because the vaudeville was not up to the standard. A good example for some others using "Vodeveal.")

The Western Film Manufacturing Company, of Chicago, has certified to the secretary of state, at Springfield, that it has changed its name to the Parisian Film Manufacturing and Film Renovating Company.

Ministers in Beloit, Wis., are said to have voiced, from their pulpits, a protest against the operation of moving picture shows on Sunday, declaring this was but the opening wedge for a "wide-open town."

Fred Law, of Nokomis, Ill., has purchased a site in Pana, Ill., where he will erect a handsome building for a moving picture show.

Ferguson & Gillespie, proprietors of the Gem Theater, Centralia, Ill., are conserving the space which might be devoted to a vaudeville stage and adding that much more room to their seating capacity for people who like the photoplay.

The Grand Opera House, Jacksonville, Ill., will run pictures this summer.

The Empire Moving Picture Theater, Lincoln, Ill., a one-story frame structure, twenty feet in width, adjacent to the main theater, collapsed April 10, but none of the spectators were hurt. Miss Marie Lacey, of Springfield, Ill., the piano player, was slightly injured. Excavations for an adjoining building are said to have weakened the structure.

Manager M. P. Harvey, of the Seawan Theater, Decatur, Ill., has installed a set of the Deagan musical electrical bells.

The Court Theater, Kankakee, Ill., is a moving picture theater which is unique in that it boasts a valuable baby grand piano superseding the upright instrument.

L. M. Rubens, of Joliet, Ill., has changed the Tavern Theater in that city to an exclusive picture house. The Crystal Stairs, owned by Mr. Rubens, is now running two reels and two vaudeville acts.

The St. Louis Moving Picture and Projecting Machine Operators' Local 143, I. A. T. S. E., gave its second annual ball at New Club Hall, April 1.

The Marks Amusement Company, of Detroit, Mich., has been incorporated, with capital stock of $100,000.

The Star Amusement Company, of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., has been incorporated, with capital stock of $20,000.

Bereschedit & Brick's new theater, which has been opened on Broadway, Aurora, Ill., will be an exclusive photoplay house, it is announced.

Members of a special committee appointed by the St. Paul, Minn., Board of Aldermen, report that practically every moving picture establishment in the city is violating the municipal code. The charges are that there are not enough exits, that the machines contain inflammable stuff and that stages are operated in many theaters. The code provides for inclosing the operating machine with fireproof material.

Press dispatches from Decatur, Ill., relate that G. H. Smith, who conducted the Royal moving picture theater in that city, has decamped. Chief of Police Allen received a letter from the Standard Film Exchange, of Chicago, stating that he had $500 worth of films belonging to the company. The officer went to the theater, it is said, and found the films scattered about the operating room, boxed them up and returned them.

The Trust Film Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $5,000, to do a general theatrical, moving picture and amusement business. The incorporators are Rudolph Frankenstein, H. S. Tuchacherer and Luke Mithen.

Founders' Day at the University of Missouri, Columbia, Mo., was celebrated by a lecture illustrated with slides showing the first graduates and the growth of the school.

The Cadillac Film Company, of Detroit, Mich., has been incorporated, with capital stock of $12,000.

The Plow Theater has been opened on South Sixteenth Street, Moline, Ill., with Frank Donahue in charge. The place is done in imitation marble and will seat 200 people. Independent pictures will be run, it is announced.

William Sexton, of Macomb, Ill., who has purchased the interest of Frank Smith in the skating rink at Smithfield, Ill., has added a picture show to the features of the place.

Arthur Boggis has purchased the moving picture theater at Mt. Carmel, Ill., from T. O. Thomas and will conduct it in the future under the name of the Gem Theater.

Hibbs & Murnan, who hold moving picture entertainments in the town hall at Princeville, Ill., announced admission of 10 and 20 cents.

A. S. Dworsky, Third and Fourth Streets, and Twenty-first and Twenty-second Avenues, North Minneapolis, Minn., has been granted a license for an airdome. Moving picture theater licenses have been issued in Minneapolis to W. J. Edwards, 44 Third Street, S.; Minnie E. Mills, 2900 Washington Avenue, S.; Abraham Siegfried, 259 Plymouth Avenue, and C. S. Steffe, 304 Twentieth Avenue, N.

Dr. Henry J. Messing, of the United Hebrew Congregational Church, St. Louis, declared the teaching of biblical history by moving pictures is most effective. This preceded an evening at the church when moving pictures of the life of Moses were exhibited.

The Morton Film Exchange, of Chicago, has been incorporated, with capital stock of $2,500, to manufacture and deal in moving picture films. The incorporators are James E. McDonald, William A. Cannon and Bertel Tressebaum.

The John F. McGrail Theatrical Exchange, of Chicago, has been licensed, with a capital stock of $2,500, to do an amusement business. The incorporators are Edward J. Ader, Edward W. Tuthen and Edith O'Malley.

J. P. Stutzman and B. E. Deake, of Athens, have opened a moving picture show in the Opera House at that city.

F. E. Coop, of Greenville, Ill., has sold the Idle Hour Theater at Greenville to H. C. Kunkler, of Edwardsville, Ill.

The Canadian Pacific will be the first trans-continental railway system to utilize moving picture films commercially, and will equip a moving picture theater car and attach it to regular trans-continental trains. That portion of the journey along the line that cannot be seen on account of darkness will be displayed in the day time as a side diversion for passengers on the long journey. The company will show duplicate films of these views in Great Britain and the United States.

EBERHARD SCHNEIDER'S SINGLE ILLUMINANT DOUBLE DISSOLVING STEREOPTICON ONE ARC LIGHT ONLY.

Eberhard Schneider claims that his invention, the single illuminant double dissolving stereopticon, is the most marvelous in modern optics, and it does awaken enthusiasm in some who see it in operation. Probably one of the oldest and one of the best expert operators of stereopticons is Mr. John C. Green, Manager of Griffins Opera House, Guelph, Ont., Canada, who sent an unsolicited testimonial, recently, which reads as follows:

"Dear Mr. Schneider:

"The machine came to hand and I am entirely pleased. The workmanship is very fine and perfect on every part of it. I have set it up and tested it out in every way and I must tip my hat to you. I have handled dissolving lanterns for 28 years and yours is the first I ever saw that dissolves perfectly with one arc light and, in fact, I like the effect fully as well as with oxy and hyd. gas, and high pressure key."

This is from a man who has bought and paid for one of these new model machines, and he only expresses what many say who see it in operation. It will be well worth the time of anyone who is thinking of getting a machine to examine carefully the merits of this new model. Where it is impossible to call in person at the factory, catalogues containing full information will be sent to any one that will enclose a 2-cent stamp, and address the manufacturers, Eberhard Schneider Company, 219 Second Avenue, New York, N. Y.

IMPROVEMENT THE ORDER OF THE DAY.

One of the best signs of the times in connection with the moving picture theater is the much nicer class of house that is considered necessary, compared with two or three years ago. True, there is much room for improvement yet in many localities, notably New York City, but here the restriction as to number of seats has been an insurmountable handicap to the enterprise of the moving picture theater manager.

Attractive fronts and entrances, with elaborate lobbies, are rapidly replacing the store front and flaring poster plastered entrance. Handsome, properly kept brass rails at ticket entrance, brass easels and poster frames and brass stock company photo frames and prop boards all add immensely to the attractiveness of every house.

The little booklet issued by the Newman Manufacturing Company, 717-719 Sycamore Street, Cincinnati, contains a number of illustrations of brass frames of all kinds for picture theaters and brass rails for ticket entrances, boxes and orchestra pits. A little extra expenditure along this line will soon repay any manager in the increased patronage it will bring. This firm is one of the pioneers in this sort of equipment, and have many testimonials in regard to the artistic, ornamental and attractive lobby displays made possible with a Newman outfit.

"THE LEADING AMERICAN EXPONENT OF THE PHOTOPLAY."

The man who is greater than his job still has ambitions to soar as high as the tower under which he sits. Admitting that his is not altogether a trade paper, he claims it to be at least a trade newspaper, and boasts that all important news is percolated through No. 1 Madison Avenue. Yes, it was through his medium that we first heard of the "trust"; he it was who announced the General Film Company. With his news gathering affiliations at No. 80 Fifth Avenue, he can put it all over us in getting inside information about the doings of his employers. But does this help the exhibitor? Is it even interesting to the reader? Not so you can notice anybody reading it. As to his article on the management of theaters, by men who know nothing of the subject, it he could but hear the comments on them by men who are in the business, he would confine all his writers to "Short Talks," and the shorter the better.

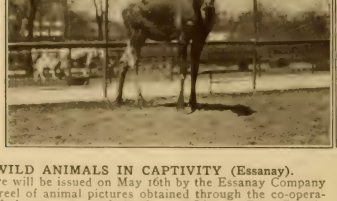
JOHN M. BRADLET.

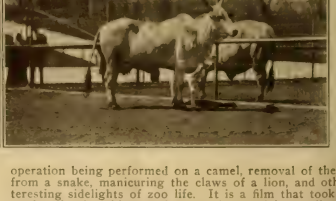
Although Mr. John M. Bradlet resigned on April 1st from his position as Western representative of the Moving Picture World, to manage the Illinois M. P. Supply Company, he will continue to write for this paper as his time permits. This will please many of our readers who have profited in the past from his sensible views on "Construction and Decoration," to which department he will still contribute. On another page will be found his views on the recent exhibitors' meeting in Columbus, Ohio, and next week we will print an article from his pen which contains some very original and forceful opinions on the question of the open market. Mr. Bradlet's address is P. O. Drawer 727, Chicago, Ill.

NEWSPAPER NOTICE.

The early returns are coming in from various points about newspaper notice of present films. We have received from the Picto Amusement Company, of Chattanooga, Tenn., a clipping of an unsolicited criticism on the Fall of Troy, which held the boards at the Picto Theater in that city for a week. In a number of quarters the newspapers are beginning to show marked interest in the dramatic value of moving pictures, and it is no idle dream to suppose that newspaper comment on the merits of photo-plays will be a daily occurrence in the not far distant future.

Mr. L. Joel, the well-known lecturer and entertainer, who for the past two years has been connected with the Tremont Casino, Bronx, N. Y., in that capacity, has accepted a position as manager of the Comedy Theater, 2365 Westchester Avenue, New York City. Mr. Joel's knowledge of the business, coupled with his experience as an entertainer, should suffice the patrons of the Comedy Theater that they will always get the best program that is to be had for the price charged for admission.





WILD ANIMALS IN CAPTIVITY (Essanay).

There will be issued on May 16th by the Essanay Company a full reel of animal pictures obtained through the co-operation of the managers of the famous Lincoln Park Zoo, in Chicago. It is not merely a series of photographs of the animals and their surroundings, but a nature study of their habits and the manner of handling the big and ferocious wild animals in captivity. Close up views show a surgical operation being performed on a camel, removal of the fangs from a snake, manicuring the claws of a lion, and other interesting sidelights of zoo life. It is a film that took many weeks of painstaking work to produce and is excellent photographically. Children and even adults in smaller towns that do not boast of a Zoo like that of the Lincoln Park will be immensely entertained by this creditable departure of the Essanay Company from the usual thing.

MOVING PICTURE IMPROVEMENT.

To the Editor of The World:

Since the outcry against the demoralizing influence of the motion picture film on children much has been done by the Board of Censors to correct this evil. While the character of the pictures at the present time may not be demoralizing, a great many of them are far from entertaining.

The great majority of the motion picture films deal with melodramatic pictures and ridiculous farces, of which few are really funny. In this class there is nothing educational or uplifting and the subjects are oft-repeated.

If the motion picture companies want to educate the people there are other ways of doing it. Once in a while one sees foreign views of travel of the panoramic type. This sort of picture has real educational value, but we see too little of such subjects. For such an entertainment one has to pay a dollar or more to visit some lecture or travelogue. Why cannot we have such views in the ten-cent show?

Brooklyn, April 19. PICTURE CRANK.

CRIME ON THE SCREEN.

Boston, Mass., May 7, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir: "A justification of cold-blooded murder" might as well be the title of the Essanay production "The Mothers." A young married man with a wife and child is employed by the United States Secret Service to run down a gang of criminals. He does his duty. The gang is caught and one of the crooks is shot while trying to escape. He dies. His wife, animated by a spirit of revenge, seeks the officer engaged to protect our constituted government, finds him at a social gathering among friends, and shoots him down in cold blood. The officers wife learns that her husband was murdered by the counterfeiter's wife and refuses to testify because there is a baby in the crook's family. Aside from the question of allowing the child of a thief to be raised by a murderess, the brutal shooting is made heroic and the destroyer of life and happiness congratulated when she is released. This is the most pronounced contribution of the school of crime yet sent forth for ten millions of men, women and children to view. AN EXHIBITOR.

HOLLAMAN WITHDRAWS FROM A. M. P. P. CO.

New York, May 10, 1911.

Mr. J. A. Leggett,
Associated Motion Picture Patents Co.,
1482 Broadway, N. Y.

Dear Sir:

Please accept my declination of the Vice-Presidency of your Company. As you remember, my acceptance was contingent upon you showing me certain proofs absolutely necessary for the carrying out of your ambitious projects. This proof not having been furnished in the thirty days past, I withdraw my tentative offer to subscribe to your stock. I am still in hearty sympathy with the objects so pleasantly outlined in your original prospectus and hope that you will yet be able to carry it through.

Hoping that you will give orders to at once withdraw my name from your printed matter.

Yours very truly,
RICH. G. HOLLAMAN.

DISTINCTIVE SLIDES.

We have just received some samples of the slides by the Illinois Motion Picture Supply Co., 167 W. Washington St., Chicago, Ill., and in looking them over we wished that we could see them on the screen and listen to the pleased expressions of the audiences, which we are sure that they will bring forth. There is something about these slides that give them an individuality all their own. We do not remember having seen anything quite along the same lines. They are striking to a remarkable degree, and in each one of them there is some object of interest that compels the attention and holds the eye.

One of them, a "Good Night" slide, shows four little girls going up stairs to bed, each with a smile on her face and a candle in her hand. Another one reads, "Western Show Tomorrow," with a cowboy coming toward us at full speed, swinging his lariat; altogether a striking slide. One of the slides reads "Just a Moment Please," and then our attention is held by a pair of soulful eyes gazing out from one of Philip Boileau's creations. The fourth one says, "Indian Show To-Morrow," showing a silhouette profile of an Indian not standing in its color and treatment. If all the slides the Illinois M. P. Supply Company are as good as these are, there is some business in store for them.

Make Yours the Great Fresh Air Theater

And You Will Win Praise and Patronage

The best and cheapest way to get perfect ventilation is to use the

KIMBLE A C. FAN

It is Reversible.

A pull of the chain changes it from exhaust to intake. Changes from full speed forward to full speed back in a few seconds.

It is a variable speed, whether pushing or pulling the air. Run it full speed (750 R.P.M.) when you want quick results. Then slow it down to 80 or 100 R.P.M. by a pull of the chain when you want to save the meter bill.

It is noiseless, and, hence, wearless.

No comment necessary.

It is cheapest, in proportion to the work it does. Costs less to install. Uses less current than any other A. C. motor, because every K.W. metered is put to work and none of the current is wasted in resistance coils or other sinful juice eaters.

OUR MOTORS AND FANS

can be used only on alternating current. Though designated as single phase, they may be used interchangeably on single, two phase or three phase circuits.

QUESTIONS ON LAST WEEK'S LESSONS.

Do NOT look at the lesson in preparing your answers. If you do, the answers will be of no practical value.

1. Give, from memory, definitions of following terms: Light Ray, Divergent Rays, Rectilinear, Homogeneous Heterogeneous, Optical Medium, Transparent, Difusion, Opaque.

2. How does light travel in homogeneous, transparent bodies?

3. Describe a "light ray."

4. Describe a pencil of rays.

5. Describe a bundle of rays.

6. Tell, in your own words, what relative proportion of the luminous power of an open light is, seen by the eyes.

7. Would a larger proportion be seen when the eyes are close to the source of light than when far away. If, so, why?

8. We can look straight at an arc lamp when one hundred yards from it, yet when but three feet away we could not do so—why?

9. Are rays of light ever really parallel to each other? If not, why not?

10. Light actually, apparently, travels in rays, yet it is seen as a mass. Explain.

That light rays travel in straight lines may be proven in various ways. We see an object by means of the rays it sends to the eye, but you cannot see around a corner. Perhaps, however, the best proof of the straight line theory of light action is found in the "pin-hole camera," with which no doubt you are all more or less familiar.

In Fig. 6 is seen a box, in which is a lighted candle. In one side of this box is an opening covered with opaque paper, tintoil or some similar thin substance, in which the small hole, X, has been pierced. A is a small screen of white cardboard, ground glass or other similar, suitable material, placed at convenient distance from and directly in front of hole X. The room in which the experiment is made being dark, it will be found that an inverted image of the candle will appear on screen A the instant the candle is lighted—why?

The answer to this is the answer to many questions concerning light action. From every point of a luminous body, also from a body visible by reason of reflection, as has already been pointed out, eminate rays traveling in every direction (Fig. 3). It therefore follows that from the candle flame (luminous body) and from the candle itself (non-luminous body, visible by reflection) rays as above go forth in every direction. The hole X, however, is but a pin-hole and will allow passage of only the one ray, from any given point, which strikes it. Remember, however, that each tiny point of the candle and its flame send forth rays in every direction. It then follows that one ray and one ray only, from each pin point in the object will pass through hole X and strike screen A. It will also be found that if a straight line be drawn from any point on the candle it will strike exactly at the corresponding point of the image on screen A, therefore, as is seen, the image formed is upside down. This proves conclusively that the rays travel in straight lines. It also follows that as we increase or decrease the distance of either the screen A or the candle itself from the hole X the image will be increased or diminished in size.

If we make other needle-holes in the front of the box we will instantly have other images on the screen, just as complete and plain as the first, until the holes become numerous enough that the images overlap each other, when they will begin to blurr, and finally, as the number of holes is still increased, disappear altogether, and in their place we shall have just plain illumination of the screen.

In this connection note that the light rays carry the color of the point from whence they eminate through the hole and impress it upon the screen. If the box be replaced by the window of a room, which the sun does not strike, the room completely darkened and a pin-hole be pierced in the window blind, it will be found that a complete inverted portrait of the scene without will be impressed upon screen A, if the letter be held before the hole. More than this, the scene will be in natural colors. Each point on the green leaf will send in a green ray while each point of a red rose will send in a red ray, every color of the view being faithfully depicted on the screen. This being reflected light we learn, incidentally, from the experiment that certain objects reflect only green rays, certain other objects only red rays, others only yellow and some rays of different colors from various points of their surface. These reflected rays not only appear green, red, etc., to the eye when viewed directly, but they color the portion of a white screen they strike the same. But this is getting a little off the subject just now in hand.

An examination of Fig 6 will, as we have said, explain why the image is and must be inverted. It could not be otherwise in view of the fact that light rays travel only in straight lines. Please understand this has no bearing whatever on the inversion of images when projected through lenses. That will come later.

Technically the theory of light traveling in straight lines is described as the "rectilinear propogation of light" and you will find it thus spoken of in text books. The correctness of the theory may be proven in many other ways, one of which is the shadow.

Let us place a candle inside a box in one side of which a hole ½ inch in diameter has been pierced, the flame being placed near to the opening. Locate the box from six to eight feet from a screen formed by a sheet, plaster wall or square of white paper, the hole toward the screen. Now hold an opaque object such as a ball, a square of paper or anything else a distance from the source of light and between it and the screen. It will be found that the shadow cast will be sharp, clear cut and exactly the shape of the opaque object, though larger. It will also be found that a thread drawn taught from one edge of the hole to the screen, in the same relative position (to the left side of the shadow if from the left side of the hole), just touching the side of the opaque object, will reach the screen exactly at the shadow's edge. The object in placing the light in a box and boring a hole is to re-trict the size of the source of light. The idea is illustrated in "A," Fig. 7.

If the source of light be large as compared with the opaque object, then another condition is created. The shadow looses its sharp edge and we have what is known as the Umbra and Penumbra. In "B," Fig. 7, the source of light L is large, but not so large as opaque object "X." A little study of the diagram will show that no light can fall on the screen from point 1 to point 2, but that as we go up from 1 or down from 2 an increasing portion of light will reach the screen, though not all, until points 3 and 4 are reached. In this illustration the black portion of the screen from 1 to 2 is called the Umbra of the shadow, while from points 1 and 2 to points 3 and 4 is called the Penumbra.

C, Fig. 7, illustrates the result if the opaque object be reduced to less size than the source of light. In that event the umbra is in the form of a cone, the length of which will be determined by (a) the relative size of the source of light and the opaque object and (b) their distance apart.

I have touched upon this matter for the reason that it tends to further prove that while it is viewed in a mass, light actually travels in rays, or waves, and only in absolutely straight lines. It is not, however, necessary to expend further space on the matter and we will pass on to consideration of the illuminating power of a source of light and its measurement.

A Most Excellent Letter.—Mr. Chas. Lauve, Franklin, La., writes: "Referring further to my communication (page 52, April 29th issue) regarding carbon setting: You state in part that you do not understand my meaning, in saying that lamp leads should not be used more than one year. I mean by this the entire wire (stranded asbestos covered) to the lamp should be discarded, in better practice, every six months, when using not over 40 amperes. As to the terminal ends, I was explicit in saying that new ends should be inserted in the terminals, after same had been sand-papered, both wire and terminals. This change should be made about once a month when using 40 amperes. As to cutting terminal ends off twice a week, as you state, in using heavy amperage, your wire and terminals being large as compared to the amperage used this seems to be unnecessary. Changing carbon screws often in heavy amperage strikes me as being more important. However, I contend that lamp wire ends should be attended to carefully once a month. Carbon screws should be backed out and ends filed and oiled with heavy oil every night. As to size of condensers, I beg to differ with you; there is no doubt in my mind but that a 6½ and 7½ combination will give the best results with throw of 45 to 80 feet. It is not all, however, to merely stick a pair of condensers in the lamp house; that is a very unimportant function. The position of the condensers is just as important as is the position of the objective. Many makes of objective lenses are condemned when the fault really lies with the condensers and all this trouble about pictures being out of focus on one side or the other lies ninety per cent. with the condensers. It is really not very serious if your machine, etc., is not exactly squared-up with your screen. You can, by finding the proper position of your condensers, get a perfectly sharp picture on all sides. I have had the same trouble as others, with my picture out of focus on one side. I squared-up the machine, changed objective lens, went to considerable expense, and all with no improvement. I then gave attention to the condensers, and the result has made me a strong believer in the power, for good or evil, of condensers. I pay as much attention in the selection of condensers as I would to selection of the objective lens. I still contend that for the above mentioned range a 6½ and 7½ will give the best results, although the proper location of the lens in each case must be ascertained, the proper distance of the back lens to the light, the proper distance of the lamp house or, more properly, the front lens, to the center of your objective. This can be accomplished by anyone, requiring just a little patience. I shall endeavor to illustrate my meaning by a sketch.

The longer the throw the further the light should be from the back condenser BUT the closer to the objective lens. The spacing of the back lens from light may be accomplished by condenser focusing device shown once "B" sketch and must be done in same manner as focusing the objective, while the picture is on the screen. It requires two persons to do this as the picture MUST be in motion. The illustrations given are not accurate but they show the idea. A-A A of the sketch is intended to give practically the same size picture. In each case a 6½ and 7½ condensing lens combination is used with perfect results. Note carefully the condenser spacing. The longer the throw the closer the lenses are together. For 45-foot throw, however, lenses should be used as received from factory.

A focusing device should be made for condensers. Will endeavor to give you cut of this also (B in sketch). The illustration you gave of my carbon setting is entirely wrong. To begin with, I do not believe in straight-up-and-down setting. My cut of this is not like it at all and am enclosing an accurate illustration of what I mean (C in sketch). I have serious doubts that the cut you showed would work at all.

"As to the outside shutter, I stand pat on that. I am aware that there is a two-wing outside shutter made; that wasn't the shutter, however, I had in mind. Certainly you could not construe that I meant a two-wing shutter inasmuch as I complained of synchronism. I used the term flicker, you use the term flashing. Well, "flashing' is right and flashing is also a whole lot worse than flicker. You contend that this does not occur except at a certain speed, and that that speed, at 60 cycles, is faster than the usual speed. Therefore, just as I contended, it deprives you of a range of speed, which is so much desired with some subjects. As to the two-wing outside shutter: on any machine it is a drawback—just in the way. I still contend that a three-wing outside shutter with A. C. is N. G., and taking your own theory as to the different speeds which you have always advocated, I cannot see how you approve the three-wing outside shutter for use with A. C. Nowadays there are a great many "improvements" in machines that are not improvements, for instance, I would like to know have an old-time 1909 model (Exhibition) Edison, as the style 'B.' The first thing most operators do with one of these new models is to get busy with a screwdriver and take most of it off. This applies to all makes. As to polarity in A. C., you contend that it make no difference about wire connection to the lamp, there being no such thing as positive or negative wire on A. C. I beg to differ with you there. The positive wire should be above (top carbon) negative below. The polarity, however, in A. C. is not very noticeable, just enough to make it worrisome. The effect in the wrong connection will give you what I might term an uneasy light (bucking) and you will get a brush light all over. I have discovered this trouble (leaving a few gray hairs) after looking for grounds, short circuits or loose contacts and about everything else. Finding no trouble in those directions I donned my thinking cap and proceeded to investigate the current. We are operating two shows in this town, taking current from the municipal plant, which is, of course, A. C., 60 cycle, 115 volts single phase. In the power plant there are two separate units; in the afternoon the smaller unit is used on the larger (peak) load; at night the larger unit is used and the smaller one shut down. I discovered that the polarities of these units were different. I therefore changed my leads to the lamp accordingly. Now the operators know exactly when these two units are changed by the difference in the light, and they immediately change their wires while your humble servant sits by and grins.

"Now, Brother Richardson, I have the greatest respect and confidence in your opinions and I always read your comments with interest and have profited thereby, but in some things I believe that you are a little wrong. Sometimes the poor fellow who takes his brain to find out some particular trouble and keeps at it, will bring some merit out that will probably benefit others. I therefore wish to apologize for taking issue with you. But as the old saying has it, 'A good idea can sometimes be gotten from a fool.' In conclusion, I wish to express my admiration and approval of the stand the Moving Picture World is taking. I have always been a Licensed exhibitor, but believe in being conservative."

I have read your letter with unusual interest. Neighbor Lauve, and have reproduced your sketches exactly as you drew them. There is no reason whatever for apologies. It is my desire that those who believe me to be mistaken in any of my statements shall take issue and discuss the matter. For it is thus we learn and I hope I haven't yet arrived at the point where I imagine I know it all, or that anyone should bow meekly to my opinions and accept them without argument if they honestly hold different views. I wish to say further that your communications would indicate you to be almost anything else than a "tool," or at least I wish we had quite a few more tools of your particular brand. I wish also to apologize for the cut in your last article. The lamp lines appear horizontal, due to a blunder on the part of the electrotyper. On the other hand, I myself, in redrawing your sketch, gave the lower carbon somewhat more of a tilt than your drawing indicated. I thoroughly agree with you that lamp leads should, as a whole, be discarded, at least once in six months when using not over 40 amperes. As to the length of time the leads inside the lamp house are in usable condition, it will vary largely. My practice has been mostly in large cities where the law requires the lamp house to be tightly closed, which has the effect of adding quite a high degree of mechanical heat to the heat generated by the current. With 45 amperes I have found that when running twelve hours a day the wires would become dark brown and lose their temper in from three to four days. Using them in this condition is not economy, from any point of view. In smaller towns where one is allowed to run with the back of the lamp house out, the wires would be in usable condition for a considerably longer time and your idea might hold good under those conditions. As to the carbon clamp screws, I would suggest that the best method of handling them is to remove them once every day, grease them with vaseline, wiping off all surplus grease and coating them with a good grade of graphite. In this way I find that they work in all times work perfectly free and easy. The inside of the carbon holders and the point of the screw should, of course, if the latter bears directly on the carbon, without the intervention of the clamp shoe, be kept clean and bright at all times. In the matter of condensers, I do not propose to argue with you very strongly on the point that I claim to be the best practice. I have for a considerable time had a very strong notion that we all have considerable to learn about the condenser matter. Unfortunately just now my time is so thoroughly and completely taken up that it is practically impossible for me to make careful experiments in this matter, even if I had the opportunity. I will gladly welcome discussion on the points you have raised in connection with condensers. I would also suggest to our readers that, so far as possible, they make careful experiments along the lines you have suggested and report the results. Of late I myself have arrived at the conclusion that many of the faults we have been attributing to other sources are really, to some extent at least, located in the condensers. I have, I believe, in my comments, quite recently called attention to the desirability of having the condensers so mounted that their distance from each other can be changed at will, though I have believed that the lenses should, in all cases, be set with their convex surfaces almost touching, the adjustment being necessary to accommodate this condition when lenses of one focal length are replaced by lenses of a different focal length. The whole matter is one of extreme importance, deserving of careful study and experiment. I therefore again ask our readers, such of them as can and will, to get very busy on this proposition. I would particularly suggest that the San Francisco Union, in their demonstrating room, conduct a series of experiments along the lines suggested by your letter; that is, if it is feasible for them to do so. I would ask Brother Crowe, of Watertown, S. D., and others of our correspondents who have evinced a disposition to inquire into obtruse points, to take the matter up. But in any experiments that are made I would call pointed attention to the fact that the results must be carefully recorded and tabulated, else they will be of slight value. For instance, supposing one is using a 6-inch objective, with two 7½ lenses, he should carefully experiment until he finds the exact condition which gives the best possible results. Having done so, he should make careful measurements and submit them. That is to say, measurement of an exact distance between the lenses and the exact distance from the face of the condenser to the film—not "pretty near," mind you, but exact. If it is then found that the results of several similar experiments coincide, we may conclude that the result arrived at is correct. As regards the outside shutter, I fully concede that the three-wing shutter does, to some extent, limit the matter of speed, but with 60-cycle current this only occurs where the speed reaches practically 80 feet of film per minute, which is, of course, higher than it is often necessary to use to get the best effect. On the other hand, the three-wing shutter gives you a much wider range of speed in the other direction, since with a properly proportioned three-wing shutter—that is to say, a shutter in which the blades are all of very nearly the same width—it is possible to run down to as low as 40 feet per minute without any flicker at all, and even somewhat lower than that without objectionable flicker, a thing which cannot possibly be done with a two-wing shutter. Therefore, I must hold that of the two propositions the three-wing shutter is the best. As regards the outside shutter as compared with the inside, I would call your attention to the article on page 298, February 11th issue, which will fully explain my reasons for preferring the outside to the inside shutter, be it three or two-wing, except that with the two-wing outside shutter one is able to get a much greater percentage of the light, while at the same time keeping the two blades of the shutter of equal size, which latter is an important factor in elimination of flicker. I should very much like to make some comparisons and say something as regards your remarks on the Exhibition Model and type "B" machines. I cannot, however, do this without laying myself open to the charge of prejudice or partiality in the matter of machines and, therefore, must refrain. What you say as regards operators having a propensity to "get busy with the screwdriver" is quite true. I am a great believer in the operator having a good kit of tools; also a believer in his using them, always provided he knows how. As regards the polarity of A. C., either you have found out something that I do not know or else you are sadly mistaken on that proposition. With A. C. each carbon is alternately positive and negative once each cycle, so that both carbons are alternately positive and both alternately negative. Therefore, if this be true, and it is most certainly the theory accepted by all electricians and all electrical engineers, I fail to see where it could make any possible difference which wire was connected to top or bottom carbon. You will observe that while I will say to you frankly your statement sounds absurd, yet I do not flatly dispute you, preferring rather to assume that you may possibly have discovered something heretofore unknown, though it doesn't in this case seem within the range of even possibility. I have given your letter space just as you wrote it and have commented on it at length because the points you have brought up are of distinct interest, and some of them of paramount importance. We shall be glad indeed to hear from you further at any time.

Caught the Point.—Mr. T. M. Morgan, Glens Falls, N. Y., writes: "In my solution of the wire puzzle (page 1013, May 6th issue) my failure to note that the wires should be changed for D. C. was an oversight. However, it should be stated that both sides of the switch must be in to light either lamp. According to diagram of Mr. Reith, this is not so, as you will readily see by following through circuit of the upper lines. You will also note in Mr. Reith's diagram, opening the switch does not kill the curcuit entirely, but leaves the lower carbon of the upper lamp alive at all times and if used in a grounded metal booth where gas pipes, wires, Edison three-wire system with grounded neutral, or on A. C. circuit from transformer having grounded secondary, the operator might be subjected to an unpleasant shock while adjusting the carbons. Supposing the left hand wire in Mr. Reith's diagram to be grounded neutral or secondary, and metal booth to be grounded, you can readily see that connection, when switch is opened, between lower carbon and upper lamp and booth would complete circuit through ground giving full amount of voltage across connection."

The matter of the lamp being alive in Mr. Reith's diagram was noted, but the matter was intentionally left unmentioned to see how many of our writers would note that point. The other item you mention, namely, that one lamp would light without the other, I did not, in glancing over the sketch, myself notice. The matter of the lamp being alive would be not only objectionable, but impractical as well, since no one would wish to be handling a live lamp in placing carbons, etc.

Discovered It Himself.—Canton, Ohio, writes: "Regarding my recent communication (May 13th issue) I believe I have solved the difficulty myself. If I am not mistaken the neutral wire is negative to one outside wire and positive to the other, so that when I said I had my rheostats on the positive wires I should have said the two outside wires. I believe you will remark as regards the carbon stubs that they are of poor quality. Anyway, I have returned them to the manufacturer at their request. They are to replace them with better carbons. I received the Handbook and need not say anything, as it speaks well for itself. You should have had your picture on the front page. I have the one published in the World about a year ago, also have one of your little Handbooks published four years ago given with the compliments of the Swanson Film Company and I still think a lot of it. Can you tell me where I can procure some very small universal joints? Is there any manufacturing company which makes them for use on moving picture machines? If so, will you give me the address? Or will any of the readers who know where such a thing can be purchased kindly let me know through the Department?"

Your solution of the three-wire proposition is correct.

There was nothing about the stubs sent indicating poor quality except that the core in the lower carbon was not very good. However, it is hard to judge quality from a short, burned stub of carbon. I do not know where you can procure a small universal joint. If any of our readers possesses the desired information I would ask him to kindly forward same.

Inadequate Plants.—Gleichen, Alberta, Canada, writes: "I am operating a Motiograph, 1910 model, D. C. current and get a good, steady picture all the time. Somehow, however, the light plant we have does not seem to be large enough. It consists of a 115 volt, 26 ampere, 3 K. W. generator, run by a 4 horsepower gasoline engine. I have tried every possible way to keep a good light, but if I do not watch very, very closely the light will die right down and it then takes fully a minute to get it going again. I have my rheostat cut down to two coils and that doesn't seem to do much good. My ammeter on the board has never passed the 18 mark. Do you think the trouble is at the switchboard? My wires to the machine are No. 4 and I have an ammeter in the booth. I am using ½-inch carbon top and bottom and it seems to give better light than with ⅝ at top. The carbons are soft cored, above and hard at bottom."

You say you have your rheostat all cut out but two coils. Unless those two coils are something out of the ordinary they would not withstand a pressure of 115 volts. Therefore, I cannot imagine just what you may be using for resistance. Your dynamo at 26 amperes is generating 2,900 Watts, which is practically 4 horsepower. The fault might be due to several things, one of which would be the engine slowing down. Another fault, the belt slipping. In either case the voltage would drop, likewise the amperage. I would suggest that if your current is less than 18 amperes and you are using ½ inch carbon above, that you might better use ⅝ solid carbon below. I would suggest that inasmuch as a number of our readers are using, and have had experience on small isolated plants, that those of them who feel they can help the brother with their solution of the difficulty immediately. Personally, I do not feel able to offer him much advice, never having had much practical experience with those very small outfits.

Neat Operating Room.—Mr. E. Schober, St. Louis, Mo., writes: "Enclosed find picture of operating room in Botanical Theater, which was taken especially for the 'Moving Picture World' at 10:30 p. m., and a flashlight picture, but from the light from the lamps in the operating room. You will note the light in the top of the lamp house of the dis-solver is burning. Also note the spotlight slide in the lower one. The other machine you cannot see. It sets over in the other corner; it is a motiograph. The picture is a time exposure of one and a half minutes, with the camera held against the wall. Our equipment consists of a motiograph, Edison Type 'B' and dissolver. I can thread the motiograph in twenty-five seconds and the Edison in twenty-two seconds, counting the time the picture leaves the curtain and the time it is back on again. How is that for speed? Everything in my operating room has its place and everything is in its place. Breakdowns are not allowed."

The picture, Friend Schober, is a remarkable one to be taken at night by incandescent electric light alone. I have never seen a picture approaching it in excellence taken under such conditions. I particularly like your statement that everything has a place and everything is in its place. Your record of threading seems almost impossible. However, we shall have to accept your word in the matter. Many thanks for the pass to your theater. I note it is not good on Saturdays, Sundays or holidays and will be careful not to use it on those days.

Loves The Art.—Mr. C. Henningsen, Stillwater, Minn., writes: "I write your department of the World, because I love the art of picture projection. It has a great future; with photography and electricity joined we rub elbows with the whole world, and at very moderate cost. Since describing (Vol. 8, page 363) how to put a nine-inch outside shutter on an old style Edison machine, I have had several letters from the 'boys,' East and West, and they are all progressives, and aim at improvements; let the good work of the department go on. When a boy I had an old reading glass with which is was great amusement to set fire to paper and dry leaves, and to find at what distance it made the hotest spot. In that way I learned the A B C of refraction.

"During the Centennial year, I was a watch maker in a village of rich people in Minnesota. Nearly all who came back from Philadelphia fetched a pair of eye glasses which, like condensers, were frail, easily broken, and hard to replace. My competitors knew little about refraction and could not replace the broken lenses. My early experiments with the old reading glass now came in handy. By measuring the broken part in the rays of the run I was able to replace broken lenses correctly, and it gave me a boost.

"If your readers will become more familiar with measuring their condensers, single and set in pairs in the sun's rays, they will develop new ideas as to the cause of the ghost on the curtain.

"I have built two theaters, have had 32 operators and learned something from each, by observation and otherwise. One of them put on the light and found there was a yellow streak on the curtain. He looked wise for two minutes and said: 'See boss, she is on the eccentric.' That was a new one on me, but he took out the condensers and projecting lense, closed down the carbons, fixed a center on the curtain by running two strings diagonally from the four corners. He then run a line from the carbons point to the center line of the curtain, and sure enough the lamp house and machine was half an inch from the true center line. He changed it and made a great improvement in the light."

I publish your letter, Friend Henningsen, for the reason that it shows the value of knowledge. We very frequently neglect opportunities to study, believing that the knowledge will never be of value. This is a serious mistake. One need never be afraid to learn, nor the least bit alarmed that he may possess unnecessary knowledge. Knowledge is power and it spells efficiency; a fact it would be well for more operators to take to heart. Never miss an opportunity of making experiments and adding to your store of information. You can never tell when the knowledge thus gathered will be of the utmost value to you.

Common Sense at Last.—The City Chemist of Cleveland, Ohio, has appealed to the Board of Health of that city to take action protecting the health of moving picture machine operators. He has made the point that they are shut up in stuffy metal boxes with no adequate ventilation. The moving picture machine lamps give off poisonous fumes which, Mr. Taussig rightly claims, are immensely injurious to health unless carried off by adequate ventilation. He found that but very few places in the city had properly ventilated operating rooms. We remove our chapeaux and make obeisance to Cleveland's City Chemist. At last one city official has discovered that the moving picture machine operator is actually human. More power to him and may he succeed in impressing his views upon the authorities of Cleveland. Oh! for a Taussig in New York, Chicago and other cities.

Good Record.—Moving Picture Operators' Union No. 182, Boston, Mass., was organized one year ago and to-day has almost 400 members in good standing, with positions employed in all but three moving picture houses doing business in Greater Boston. The union maintains a free employment bureau for its members at 734 Washington Street, so that operators may be obtained at any time by application. I might add that the editor of this department expects to spend Sunday in Boston before long and hopes to have the pleasure of meeting some of the Boston boys.

Special Fire Escape for Operators.—Manager Weaver, of the New Riverdale Theater, Clayton, Ohio, has provided a special fire escape from the operating room booth above the main auditorium to the sidewalk in front of the building. Fire Chief Romby, Clayton, declared the idea to be a most excellent one and will urge other moving picture houses to provide like protection for machine operators. Really, it this keeps up somebody will discover after awhile that the operator is even entitled to eat once in a while, and the innovation of allowing him time to get supper will be inaugurated. There is no telling what good things the future holds for the operators when innovations of this kind are established. Seriously, however, the manager of the Riverdale is to be congratulated on his consideration for the safety of the man who gives the show.

Several Questions.—Mr. E. L. Walling, Lompock, Cal., writes: "In reading over the sample copy you sent, I find the 'Moving Picture World' to be a magazine no operator ought to be without. Enclosed, therefore, find $2.00 for a year's subscription. Lately I have had trouble getting a clear field. Can find no way to correct it. Moving the lamp house does no good. I am using A. C., 110 volt, 60 cycle through a 110 volt, 60 cycle, 55 ampere Formastat, 30 ampere plugs, 85 foot throw; 7½ and 6½ inch condensers; 6 inch lens; Electra carbons (which I file flat); Edison model 'B' machine. Have to run Formastat at next to the highest notch. Who makes the Ao-2 flat carbons? I found a few here and I find them excellent for this current. Is the Fort Wayne compensarc a better device than the Formastat? Could I get D. C. from A. C. and how?"

I think very likely, Friend Walling, your trouble in getting a clear field is due to fault in carbon setting. I would suggest that you remit $1.50 for operators' and managers' Handbook, in which several pages are devoted to carbon setting, accompanied by illustrations. For a six-inch lense I think you will get better results with 7½ inch condensers; at least, I should try two 7½ and see what comes of it. Be sure that the ends of your wires in the ends of your lamp house are not charred, and that the inside of your carbon holders is clean, so that they make good electrical contact. Be sure that your machine is in exact line from the front end of the projection lens to the arc. This is to say that a line stretched from the center of the crater to the center of the front end of the objective lens barrel (all lenses being removed) passes exactly through the center of the condenser housing and aperture plate and lens barrel. No, I do not know who makes the carbons you name. If your carbons are properly set, though, you will find that side to be of no particular value, but the setting of carbons for alternating current must be done very accurately. I am not acquainted with the Formastat, though I understand it is an excellent transformer. You can get D. C. from A. C. by the use of a mercury arc rectifier, which you will find advertised in these columns. The machine is thoroughly practical and in every way excellent. You can also get D. C. by installing a 60 or 75 volt dynamo driven by 110 volt, 60 cycle, alternating motor. You will effect some saving also in that you will reduce the current from 110 to 60 or 75 in the process of transformation, but do not try to go below 60. There are reasons why it cannot be done. Personally I would regard the rectifier as the better proposition of the two.

Cannot Make It Out.—Mr. Gordon C. Dowdy, Athens, Ga., has filled up a postal card with some inquiry, but for the life of me I cannot make out what it is all about. The only sentence decipherable is, "Does your Handbook contains any information concerning electric connections?"

I am afraid, Friend Dowdy, you will have to be a little more careful to set your questions out in a clearer form. After a postcard has been rubbed around in the mails for a few days, lead pencil writing thereon is not any too easy to decipher at best. The Handbook treats briefly of wire joints, etc.

Enthusiastic.—Mr. R. P. Jones, Whitefish, Mont., writes: "Just received the Handbook and am more than pleased with it. Enclosed find photo of a Chemo-Crystal curtain, one of which I am using in my theater. This curtain is all that is claimed for it and if you have never seen one the manufacturers would be glad to send you a sample on request. It is the best screen I have seen to date, although I don't claim to be an authority on projecting curtains. Thought, however, you might be interested if you have never seen one of these screens. I wish you all kinds of success with the Handbook."

I had already seen the photograph you kindly submit. I have no doubt but what the screen is a good one. As to making a request for sample, you will have no excuse me. That is something I do not in any instance do. If the company wishes to send me a sample, well and good; but that matter is up to them. Glad to know you like the Handbook and trust you may derive much benefit therefrom.

Information Wanted.—Oklahoma (name of town and party suppressed by request writes: "Why is it my new Standard lamp always throws a ghost just to the left of the lower right hand corner of my picture? This ghost can be plainly seen on a light picture or when an actor wearing white passes through it. My throw is 85 feet and I have a 6½ condenser next the arc and a 7½ ahead. I am pulling from a 60 cycle, 110 volt line, through a compensarc, but do not seem able to get amperage enough. I have to keep compensarc on 60 ampere notch, though I do not seem to be able to get over 35 amperes, and that is not enough, I know. Have tried a 5½ and 6½ inch condenser and have reversed them. Also the ones I have now but the ghost remains. Would also like to know some way of letting my lamp down, so I can get a better slant on the carbons. A Standard lamp seems to be made to work with carbons straight up and down. I am a constant reader of the 'World' and have received much valuable information through the Trouble Department. I also have a Handbook, which helped me out wonderfully when I took my present position and started in on a Standard machine—a mechanism I had never before seen."

The question immediately comes up, Oklahoma, as to what you mean by "ghost." Since you speak of its appearing when a white object moves across the screen I am led to suppose that you probably mean travel ghost, which is due to the shutter being slightly out of time; the remedy is to properly time your shutter. If, however, by "ghost" you mean a dark spot on the screen, then, as our Eastside friend would say, "That is something else again." You will have to give me more definite information. What makes you think you only get 35 amperes when on the 60 ampere notch? Remember that your fuses are on (or should be on) the line (primary) side. Your arc voltage, when using D. C., will probably be about 35 and 35 x 60 is 2,100 watts, which, divided by 110, indicates a little less than 20 amperes, taken from the 110 volt line, hence 20 ampere primary fuses would probably carry 60 amperes secondary. As to the Standard lamp; you may secure greater slant by having a blacksmith make a longer connecting bar between the lamp and the tilting arm. By this adjustment screw you then will probably ground on the lamphouse when you pull the lamp clear back—if you ever do so.

Travel Ghost.—St. Louis, Mo., writes: "I have a Powers No. 6 machine and am troubled as follows: I find it impossible to get all the travel ghost out. When I set the shutter far enough over to take it out on one side then I get a little ghost in the other side. It is not enough to be noticeable, except on the titles; nevertheless, I think there must be something wrong, since surely there should be no ghost present. My throw is 40 feet, and my picture 16."

The last sentence of your letter explains the whole matter, St. Louis. Your throw is a very short one, and your picture, at the same time, is of fairly good size. This combination means that you have a very short focal length lens, which in turn means that the lenses are situated quite a distance from the shutter, which in turn means that the light rays have spread considerably by the time the light beam reaches the shutter, all of which has the practical effect of reducing the width of the shutter blade. The Powers people make a special shutter to be used in just such cases as this, in which the two flicker blades are considerably narrower and the main blade somewhat wider than in the ordinary three-wing shutter sent out with the No. 6 machine. Be sure, however, that there is no end motion in your shutter shaft. Keep the two set collars, on either side of the outer boxing, set up snug and close to the casting—just as close as is possible without binding. A little end motion at that point will go a long way towards causing travel ghost.

Common Sense.—Salt Lake City writes: "Will you tell us why it is that the committees of the National Board of Fire Underwriters and city officials, when formulating rules and laws to regulate moving picture theaters' boxing rooms, auditoriums, etc., do not call into consultation practical moving picture men? In looking over the rules and laws of various cities and of the National Board of Fire Underwriters, it seems to me that most certainly no practical projection or photoplay men could have been consulted in their drafting."

You have hit a very large nail very squarely on the head, Salt Lake City. It would seem that the authorities in the various cities, as well as the National Board Committees would, when drafting laws about something they cannot certainly claim to have any expert knowledge concerning, call into consultation those who have such knowledge.

Criticism.—Washington, D. C., writes: "As one exhibitor who is doing all in his power to lift the moving picture business to a higher and more respected plane, I would like, through your Department, to make a plea to those in position to aid in uplifting the business, but who, on the contrary, are doing all they can to injure and degrade it. Why should a theater with large patronage simply murder the pictures when they have a rush of business by pushing them through the machine so fast that the pictures dance all over the screen and the actors appear as though inmates of a lunatic asylum? I would refer, in this connection, particularly to an exhibition at the Empress Theater of this city, April 17th, p. m. On this occasion the 'Fall of Troy' was on the program, which same, I venture to say, is one of the greatest pictures ever produced. This splendid feature of 2,000 feet was run in 19 minutes by the watch. You should have seen the soldiers charge. You would have imagined they were maniacs, or else equipped with an invisible flying apparatus. The magnificent production was absolutely ruined by the terrific speed at which it was shown. Now, if a house of supposed good standing does such things as this, what can you expect the public to think of moving pictures as a high class means of amusement? It is small wonder that the public condemn moving pictures if they are shown in such a disgusting manner. I wish it distinctly understood that this criticism is written in no carping spirit, but solely and entirely for the good of the business as a whole, and I trust it will be accepted in that spirit."

I think, Washington, your letter requires practically no comment. Time and again I have pointed out the unquestioned fact that such procedure amounts to an outrage against the business as a whole. The manager who does that kind of business in Washington is not only injuring his brother exhibitors in Washington, he is injuring the exhibitors of New York, of St. Louis, of San Francisco and, in fact, every city and town in this country, because he is striking a body blow at the business as a whole. If I had my say about it, the man who runs a reel of pictures in seven minutes to-day would not have any pictures to run to-morrow, simply because he couldn't get any. It is a sad commentary upon the intelligence of exhibitors when houses, supposed to be in what we call the high class, perform such outrageous capers as this. One may perhaps expect such things of a store front theater in the city slums, but one does not expect the manager of a high class house to try to assassinate the business with a butcher knife. Very likely some exhibitors guilty of the "chase 'em through" habit will umbrage at these comments. If so, I have no apology to make. Let them retire to the privacy of their basement, if they have one, sit down on the coal pile and think it over. Possibly after ruminating for a week or two in the quiet and darkness they may be able to see a great light and come to an understanding of the fact that it is possible to save at the spigot while the whole contents of the barrel is running away at the bung hole—to gather in a few extra nickles, or dimes, and loose dollars in future business by so doing.

School Demonstration.—Rochester, N. Y., writes: "I am about to introduce something up here in Rochester that has never before been attempted, viz: moving pictures as an educational factor in the public schools. As yet, I have been unable to give a thorough demonstration, since it seems very hard to obtain the right kind of subjects. The Pathe Freres are going to try to get me some pictures, but we intend, in the course of time, to make our own pictures, because those now made are not practical for educational purposes, for the reason that they almost always merely set forth one phase of a product instead of starting when they sow the seed, take a little each month until the product is ready for the market, then showing marketing, manufacture, etc., in fact the entire process from seed-time to finished product. One of the principals in the schools here is attempting to place the projection in the hands of a man whose competency is at least open to very grave question. This he does simply because he doesn't wish to pay the price for a good man. Evidently he values a few dollars more than the lives of something like 1,000 children. He said that any young man who could light the lamp and turn the handle was capable to act as operator; yet he wants perfect projection."

Glad to hear from you, Rochester, and to know that you are starting the educational projection work in your city. The judgment of a principal who is willing to place a moving picture projection machine in the hands of an incompetent man, thus endangering the lives of children, is certainly open to grave question. Pictures along the lines you suggest will undoubtedly be made sooner or later, but if you undertake to make them yourself you will find you have tackled quite something of a good sized job.

Daylight process.—The editor of this department has received numerous letters asking his opinion of the Herbst process of daylight projection, now known as the Casey process, during the past thirty days. By invitation of My Pat Casey, owner of the process, through his representative, Mr. Clint Wilson, the writer witnessed a demonstration of the process recently. He was much and very agreeably surprised at results shown. The time was 10:30 a. m., the morning bright and sunny and the New York Theater Roof Garden quite well illuminated by daylight entering through considerably more than fifty (50) practically unshaded windows. The curtain itself was a plain drop coated with alabastine. It had a decidedly yellowish tinge and was what the writer would consider a poor projection screen. The projection was by a Powers No. 5 and around the picture was thrown, by means of an ordinary stereopticon, in the carrier of which was a suitable metal slide, a not very brilliant band of plain white light, something like two feet in width—top, bottom and sides. When the band was projected with the moving picture light shut off the space within its borders, upon which the picture is projected, showed much darker than did the surrounding curtain outside the light band or border. When the band of light was projected and the moving picture light was also projected, but without the film, the moving picture appeared much the stronger of the two.

After viewing the performance and asking Mr. Smith, the operator, to do certain things with the two lights, I am of the opinion that the whole thing may be set down as nothing more or less than an optical illusion. But be that as it may the result unquestionably is there, and that after all is what counts. Notwithstanding the fact that the theater was very well lighted indeed, by daylight, the picture (a fair sized one, though not large) showed up well. It was, indeed, probably better than is usually seen in the average dark theater, and it must be conceded that this is a remarkable showing. On the strength of what the writer viewed he is prepared to say that the Casey process (formerly the Herbst process), if in the hands of a competent, careful operator, who will use the device intelligently, is a pronounced success.

"The Panama Canal in 1911" (Edison).—To produce and show such an excellent picture of the greatest engineering work the world ever saw is worthy of high commendation. The audience is brought almost as close to the work as though actually present where it is in progress. All the various operations, the machinery, the tools, and the men themselves are clearly photographed. This film should be useful for special purposes aside from exhibition in theaters.

"Tunis, Africa" (Gaumont).—Here we have a series of interesting views made in this old city, the capital of the French dependency of the same name. A portion of the scenes photographed in the old town are particularly good because they preserve pictures of that portion of Tunis which is fast disappearing. The views showing the Arabians in their daily life are excellent in their way, too, and clearly photographed.

"The Derelict Reporter" (Vitagraph).—This is a thrilling story of a reporter who is given one more chance to make good. He does it through a series of events, not impossible, yet not likely to occur. However, he gets his story in ahead, which is the essential feature, even though some linemen tap the wire, a quite unusual thing to do, and send it for him. This picture is a condensed novel rather than a drama. It is well acted. The Vitagraph Company must have found some real soldiers somewhere.

"Josh and Cindy's Wedding Trip" (Edison).—This is a comedy sketch which is filled with laughter; but its joy is wholly in the excellent acting. Josh and Cindy make a friend and later, when on their wedding trip to the great city, they get into trouble through counterfeit money which Josh picked up, and their friend gets them out of the fix. The Edison artists usually give very natural characterizations. The parts of Josh and Cindy do require a little caricaturing, but too much would have spoiled them. They are both delightful, as given here.

"The Page's Devotion" (Urban-Eclipse).—This dramatic picture of courtly life is placed in a very beautiful old chateau with a moat. The baroness has a lover, and when the old baron finds this out her page takes the lover's place, thus permiting him to escape. The scenes are each given a monotint which, especially in a hunting scene, gives them much beauty. The story is wisely conducted to bring out its dramatic possibilities. It is, of course, beautifully acted and, placed in this romantic scenery, makes a very desirable film.

"The Young King of Rome" (Gaumont).—Here is a very simple story of the little son of Napoleon which has a delightful note of originality. The eagle refuses a petition; the eaglet pleads for the petitioner and has the pleasure of handing her the paper pardoning her son, a political prisoner. We have had such stories before; but no picture of the little King of Rome like this. He is simply rich; the way he assumes the attitudes of his great father will be a joy to any audience. The play is a credit to the Gaumont Company.

"The Snare of the City" (Essanay).—Simple, natural acting makes this story of farmhouse and city life a very commendable film. As in many of the photoplay's real successes, the direction, production and acting, and not the story, are significant and interesting. Yet here one sister who had a position in a city shop gets her sister a job, and she comes from the old farm. She walks not in the ways of discretion, and the older sister protects her by a sacrifice. It has a happy ending in the old sitting room at home.

"The Fiddle's Requiem" (Kalem).—In this very sentimental story, there passes before a sad, old musician, playing a violin in a garret, the dream shape of a sweetheart whom long ago he had loved and lost. He sees the past unrolled before him, telling a tragic story. Then, awakening from his dream, exhausted with age and long continued sorrow, he falls, and his soul goes on to meet that of his lost love. The picture is real, and holds the audience silent until it closes.

"Indian Justice" (Pathe).—This is a Western picture by the American Company, telling an Indian love story in which there are no white men; jealousy plays a part in it. There is a thrilling struggle, ending with one Indian going over a precipice to his death. The victor, Leaping Elk, is trailed and captured, but Swift Arrow aids in a thrilling escape, and together they go to Leaping Elk's home tribe, where they marry by dipping their hands in the sacred stream and vow fealty to each other. The scenery utilized as a background is characteristic and picturesque, while the Indians and their trappings are as accurate as possible.

"Wismar, Germany" (Urban).—We see in this film a small seaport town in the duchy of Mecklenburg. It is typically German, presenting an excellent reproduction of Teutonic characteristics. The narrow, irregular streets are particularly notable. The operator selected his viewpoints with discretion, and the printer produced a film of more than average excellence.

"Aida" (Edison).—This photoplay, beautiful, intensely dramatic and human, was adapted from the opera and reproduced sumptuously and accurately. The part of Aida, the leading role, is played by Mary Fuller; that of the King of Egypt, by Charles Ogle; Amneris, his daughter, by Nancy Avril; Radames, an Egyptian officer, by Marc McDermott; King of Ethopia, Aida's father, is Guy Coombs; the High Priest of Isis is Robert Brower. It seems scarcely necessary to repeat the story, the scene of which is laid in Egypt, and begins when Aida, the Ethiopian princess, who is a prisoner in the hands of the Egyptians, is given as a slave to Amneris, the daughter of the Egyptian king, and wins the affection of Radames, Amneris' lover. The story ends with the death of Radames, who is buried alive for treason, in disclosing to Aida the plans for an Egyptian campaign against Ethiopia. When he enters the stone tomb which is to be sealed up with him inside he finds Aida already awaiting him there, proving her great love by choosing to die with him. There are numerous interesting scenes reproducing life at the ancient court of Egypt. The setting in these scenes is so elaborate, and so carefully are the details worked out, that the pictorial effect in each instance is beautiful. Its beauty and illusion of naturalness are apparent from the beginning to the end. The fact that the names of the actors are given is notable. Indeed, this film will probably rank as the best of the week.

"When the Dead Return" (Kalem).—With the scenes laid in a lumber camp, presumably in the Canadian forests, this story is based upon a loss of memory caused by a blow on the head. The unfortunate man forgets all about himself, his family, and his surroundings. He wanders to another camp, where he remains for years. A shock brings back his memory, and he returns to his old home just as his daughter is being married. He thinks she is his wife, not realizing the lapse of years, and is quite overcome when he learns what has transpired during his lost years. The story is worked out with care and the actors perform their parts with sympathy.

"Max Is Forced to Work" (Pathe).—Poor Max has more troubles. His parents turn him outdoors with only a dress suit, but he turns it to good account. He finds employment as a waiter. All would have gone well, only the girl to whom he was making love came to dine with her father. Then things began to happen, but Max wins out in the end, affording the audience a hearty laugh over his misfortunes.

"Through Venice" (Pathe).—Many of the views of this wonderfully interesting old city were taken from a gondola. Characteristic scenes were selected for reproductions, and the audience acquires an excellent idea of the city before the film ends. The attention which the audience devotes to the picture is sufficient testimony of what the average person thinks of a travelog.

"Soldiers Three" (Vitagraph).—This is a more than ordinarily good comedy. Three soldiers lose their uniforms while bathing, are reported as drowned, are obliged to go home clad principally in sunshine, which is shaded by a few bushes. Rigged out in girls' clothes, they are court martialed for losing their uniforms. One funny situation follows another so close that the laughter is without intermission. It would be difficult to conceive of more laughably absurd situations than are developed before the story is told.

"Misplaced Jealousy" (Biograph).—This lively comedy presents the troubles of a French hairdresser who becomes jealous of the devotion of a male patron to a manicure girl. When the trouble-maker writes to the man's wife he gets himself into trouble.

"The Belated Bridegroom" (Lubin).—A long list of harrowing accidents which happened to a man on his way to his wedding are related by this film. The best use we can think of for this picture is an argument for good roads. It's the old story of a man who goes a train, takes an automobile and that breaks down, buys a motor cycle and comes to grief on a stump, takes a buggy and the wheel comes off, etc., etc., only to arrive too late for his own wedding. He promptly marries the bridesmaid. The audience plainly expressed its enjoyment of that long series of broken-down vehicles, and the surprising ending.

"Mary's Stratagem" (Melies).—We have in this film a Western picture that is different. Girls have been captured by Indians before, but it remained for this girl to challenge the chief's warriors to a race. On the chief's horse, she rode to victory, but forgot to stop, and soon all the warriors in the tribe were after her. There was a little jealousy mixed up with the matter to begin with, a lover's misunderstanding of the presence of a gaudy handkerchief. Only for this, Mary wouldn't have been riding alone, and wouldn't have been captured by the Indians. The disconsolate lover enters now and, while drinking from a spring finds Mary's comb He also finds her watch and has an opportunity to rescue Mary from the rushing horde of savages. Then Shorty, who really lost the handkerchief and was bemoaning his fate, is given his property; the lovers' quarrel is patched up.

"In Old California When the Gringoes Came" (Selig).—In this we have a beautiful story of California during the reconstruction days following its cession to the United States. It presents vivid pictures of the Spanish grandee life, just passing away, and the unscrupulous land-grabbers who in many instances succeeded in securing valuable estates because the Spanish owners would not register their properties as required by law. The main interest in this picture lies in its truth. There is no love story, and when the American agent shoots the land grabber to prevent him committing intentional murder the audience is ready to applaud. The actors have caught the spirit of the time and occasion, and the setting is picturesque and interesting.

"The Crusade of the Templars" (Gaumont).—The scenes in this picture carry the audience back to six centuries after Christ, the time when Christendom was trying to wrest Palestine from the infidels. The principal interest will attach to the stage settings, which are historically accurate and afford an excellent idea of the customs of the period. The scenes in the palace, when the son bids his blind mother good-bye, the scene on the battlefield in Palestine, and the scene when the son returns are all very interesting, and are worked out with care. The educational value of such a film is high.

"Short Lived Happiness" (Pathe).—Here we are shown the story of an unfortunate boy, doomed to the ills of life, given a chance to die after a few days of happiness. Two characters attract attention. The unfortunate youth and the vindictive and jealous man who wanted to be a lover. The boy's fate will arouse sympathy. The jealous man will exert quite the opposite influence. A simple story, clearly told.

"Hungry Hearts" (Vitagraph).—This film gives the story of two children who are neglected by their parents till they get hungry for love, but they find means of awakening their parents to the situation. Seized with feigned pains, the little ones succeed in stirring things up pretty well before the real difficulty is diagnosed and the parents begin to apply the right remedy. The story appeals irresistibly to the audience.

"In the Days of '49" (Biograph).—A love episode is here told amid surroundings that vividly portray the exciting days when the gold fever possessed half the nation. The restless longing for wealth is typified in the character of Weston. The love affair between Weston's wife and the gambler is well developed. The gambler's warning is timely and recalls the erring wife to her senses. The picture then centers about the miners, their costumes and the reproduction of life as it then was. Presumably the setting is historically correct, and the picture therefore possesses some degree of historic interest. The actors do their work well.

"That Awful Brother" (Lubin).—We have in this film a comedy full of human touches that keep the audience wondering what is coming next. These wayward brother, accustomed to traveling in side-door Pullman's, could scarcely have arrived at a more inopportune time. A series of misadventures follow that end when brother is found sleeping peacefully in a closet. It is a laughable film and keeps the audience in good humor from beginning to end.

"My Daughter" (Pathe).—This is a story that French people may understand; but to Americans, there will surely be something inhuman in it. A mother gives her daughter, when three years of age, to a rich family to be educated as their own child. She is adopted for seventeen years. She is now of age (21) and is about to be married when her mother appears and demands her back, takes off her bridal veil and leads her away from the fiance back to the wretched hovel because the drunken man she lives with demands it. This is called on the screen "Man's Law." The man fights for the daughter and the mother is thrown down. The daughter is rescued by her fiance just in time and the mother dies in the hospital. This is called "God's Law"—and the daughter weeps when the mother dies. It is a film with much dramatic power and is excellently photographed.

"Over Luzerne, Switzerland, in an Airship" (Pathe).—If the audience please, it can, while looking at this picture, think itself sailing in an airship over the beautiful city of Luzerne. The illusion is almost perfect. The appearance of the city and its surroundings makes an interesting picture apart from the illusion that you are flying, a delicious thrill which can scarcely be described. The mechanical part of the work is surprisingly well done, considering the disadvantages of operating under such conditions.

"Lost and Won" (Selig).—This love story has a very interesting background and its chief feature is an oil well in the California fields—a gusher of surprising volume. Beside there are one or two very humorous scenes of "behind the scenes" in a moving picture studio. A poor young man loves a rich man's daughter. The rich man interferes and the poor man loses his job and goes West, where he becomes a rich oil magnate. The rich business man loses his fortune and his daughter gets a job as a motion picture actress. The oil man sees her picture in a moving picture show and so they find each other again. The scenes, representing actual occurrences in the oil fields, are interesting. They bring to many people, who would otherwise have no opportunity, to see an oil well in geyser-like operation an accurate reproduction of what happens about a big gusher. The mechanical work is admirably done, and the picture does not fail to attract favorable comment in the audience.

"Holding His Own" (Essanay).—A novel situation is here developed when a gentleman who has a baby thrust upon him in an electric car is arrested for kidnapping, and it turns out that he has been literally holding his own. The situations leading up to the man's finding this out are well handled. The facial expression of the man when he finds that he has been holding his own child is well worth seeing.

"The Laundry Lady's Luck" (Essanay).—Mrs. O'Brien finds a roll of bills on her way to do the Allison washing. She places it for safe keeping in her stocking. This has a hole in it, and the bills are variously scattered without the owner's knowledge. When she does discover her loss and finds the cause of the disappearance she makes Mr. Allison give up the roll to make it good. Some humorous situations develop as the story unfolds, and the interview with Allison is vigorous.

"Three of a Kind" (Gaumont).—Here is a drama representing the adventures of a young man who is apparently equally beloved of three girls. Only when he is charged with a crime does the sterling character of the love of one of them display itself. The hour is then struck and she proves the true one. The story, somewhat improbable affords an excuse for presenting a series of interesting views about a very beutiful country dwelling. The play is pleasant, the actors perform their parts well, and there is enough of the picturesque about it to make it eminently attractive.

"Spring Heeled Jack" (Gaumont).—This is a trick picture illustrating some very remarkable wall jumps. The falls Jack gets, however, are what afford the most merriment.

"Edna's Imprisonment" (Edison).—This picture shows the child actor, Edna May Weick, to good advantage. Her father and mother, played by Guy Coombs and Miss Miriam Nesbitt, think she is locked in a vault with a time lock on it, when she is in a chute of the vault, hidden behind the wardrobe by the office boy, who forgets her and goes his way. He remembers her after he gets home, and her wild dash for the office is a record maker. He arrives in time to prevent blowing open the vault. Then he receives an admonition of what may be termed a time for forgetfulness.

"The Bunco Game at Lizard Head" (Essanay).—This comedy shows how two confidence people, a man and a woman, played all the boys at Lizard Head and won. After the brilliant couple had disappeared the boys decided the experience was worth the money, and let it go at that.

INDEPENDENT.

"The Lucky Banana Seller" (Great Northern).—A banana seller purchases a lottery ticket, wins a big prize and apes a wealthy gentleman with highly amusing results.

"A Would-Be Sportsman" (Great Northern).—This picture shows the difficulties encountered by a gentleman who thinks himself a sport. After all sorts of tribulations, he concludes that he has suffered all the occasion really requires, and goes home satisfied with his sport and what it cost him.

"The Fountains of Rome" (Itala).—Here is a travelog of merit, well photographed and exhibiting a number of interesting points about the famous city.

"Foolshead—Life Insurance Agent" (Itala).—Once again Mr. Reed delights the audience with a series of actions and misadventures, all quite impossible, yet highly amusing. Any audience will laugh at what Foolshead does, no matter how absurd it may be. And this film is no exception to the general rule.

"The Awakening of Galatea" (Powers).—This film gives the story of the statue that came to life. The Greeks made such life-like statues that it was very natural in them to invent this story, a jue de spirit that many simple minds believed. The producer has very wisely given this version of it a touch of humor. We are not passionately fond of beauty, and it is very hard for us to understand how real the sculptor Pygmalion's passion for the lovely marble woman was. However, the statue when she comes to life finds humanity,in some ways,unpleasant and after adventures that plainly show that she had a real woman's heart, she goes back to the pedestal and vanishes. The story is clearly shown and well acted.

"The Crisis" (Powers).—This comedy is based upon one of those interesting events (it was twins) that occur in young families. The man is extremely nervous, a perfectly natural thing, of course, and the doctor gives him a dose that makes him sleep and dream. Then he sees visions, all pleasant. Eventually, a small bundle is brought to him—a baby boy, but almost before he is done with his ecstacy the second consignment arrives, another baby boy. Truly, not only his cup but the table-set must be overflowing with joy. Under such circumstances the picture ends.

"The Joys of Persecution" (Powers).—This lively comedy shows the usual effect of persecution. The parents wanted the girl and the young man to marry, so of course they wouldn't; the parents didn't want them to marry, so of course they would. For the young people, it is all earnest; for the old folks, it is simply rich. The fun comes to the audience, for they are "let in" by the old people, and can watch their scheme work.

"The Pillars of Society" (Thanhouser).—This is a very interesting picture of Ibsen's drama of the same name. The parts of Johan Tonneson and of Bernick are particularly well acted; but the whole company was well-chosen and does credit to the Thanhouser producer. On the whole, this ambitious film is simply successful, though the story is extremely hard to understand till two or three scenes have passed. There are two stories of love interwoven, but they do not seem so important as the representation of the facility with which a man, looked up to and respected, lived a lie. Ultimately, the innocent man is cleared of suspicion. The guilty one is forced by his chastened conscience to confess. His wife forgives him, and the second love story reaches a happy ending.

"Out of the Dark" (Champion).—Here are, in the first scene, roystering cowboys fighting over a girl at a dance. Later, one is ordered away on pain of being shot on sight. He goes blind and when, through a series of events, the boys discover his plight, instead of shooting him, they contribute the money necessary to pay the expense of restoring his sight. In the end, he returns to his sweetheart, hale and well, out of the dark. The action is spirited and the story is well told.

"The Other Man" (Nestor).—Interpreted with all the witchery of the Nestor Company's art, acting and photography, this somewhat hackneyed subject becomes unusually interesting. A servant girl in a rage, the sudden appearance of a man she doesn't know, a telephone message to the husband, and the mischief is done. Then begins a wild chase on the part of the husband to his home. There he is confronted by his wife and her father. They didn't understand the reason for his hysterical greeting, and because of his actions he felt so ashamed of himself he never told. Here is life, action, spirit, and an exhibition also of some of the lower traits in human nature dramatically set forth. The photography of the Nestor films is always a feature of enjoyment, and this one is no exception to the rule.

"Such is the Kingdom" (Reliance).—A sermon is here shown on the screen. It set forth the hypocrisy of a minister who loves his outward whitened walls more than the inward sweetness of human love. He had admonished his neighbor for severity toward children, but is coldly and wantonly severe with his own daughter, who deserves only praise, severe even to turning her out into the world. The story is told very plainly. Even the talented actress who played the heroine seemed more anxious to make the text clear than to show the emotional content of the situation. It is an effective picture, our only comment being that the subject wasn't the best kind for a photoplay.

"Susceptible Dad" (Solax).—This comedy shows the means by which a young couple circumvented an objecting father and secured his consent to a wedding. The young man is ordered from the house. He then impersonates a school chum of his sweetheart. With this the father speedily falls in love. Then the denouement comes and, amid hilarity, the father gives his consent.

"The Ultimate Sacrifice" (Rex).—This picture follows more or less closely the novel in which Balzac most powerfully shows the scoriac passions of the period following Napoleon's. If we say that it is not quite up to the Rex standard, we leave ample margin still for praise. The story does not lend itself very well to drama. It has been tried on the legitimate stage and failed. Photoplays have a queer way of telling the plain, democratic truth of any situation, and the truth of passion is never pleasant. The scene where d'Armand threatens to ruin the beautiful face of the duchess by enlarging her mouth with his saber is not very beautiful. Balzac pictured him as about to brand her forehead. Many of the other scenes are extremely beautiful, though one or two of them might have been better for a little foreground. The photography is impeccable, and the story plain and effective. This film has a quality that will make the majority of people very glad that they have seen it.

"Bill as a Toreador" (Lux).—A lively comedy with a love scene at a fancy dress ball as background is given to us in this brisk picture. The bull that chases Bill, even though a fake bull, looks real and fierce, and his little legs beat a merry tattoo along the street as he annihilates distance. The very astute and brave policemen also are fooled, and vacate with considerable rapidity. What Bill gets when the fake is discovered makes a lively ending.

"Fashion and Its Consequences" (Lux).—This comedy shows the troubles which came to a woman who wore a harem skirt. She is shown at work with a fruit-barrow, for after she loses the skirt part on a nail in a fence, she has only the trousers left, and looks very much like an Algerian soldier. It is for being out without full equipment that she is made to toil. Her son-in-law rescues her. This picture tickled the men.

"The Sinner" (Thanhouser).—Here is an extremely well directed emotional story. A priest, son of a man accused of murder, keeps his vow and hides what was revealed to him in the confessional, though his knowledge could have cleared his father. After the innocent man is convicted, the true murderer makes a full public confession. The priest's father is at once freed. The murderer dies from wounds he got while trying to escape. The story deals with deep things, and handles them remarkably well. The acting is commendable and the background interesting, it being a contest between employees and their employer.

"Zelda, the Gypsy" (Yankee).—This picture was repeated at the 14th Street Theater, New York, by request. Zelda, the Gypsy (Mexican, apparently, by her dress) is married to a brutal man. A young American falls in love with her, but when he learns that she is not single, he presses his suit no further. But, when Zelda runs away from her husband, he lends her disinterested aid. His step-mother wants his property, so she excites the gypsy's jealousy, hoping that he will kill her step-son. This he thinks he had done, and hurries to the step-mother's house to ask her to help him escape. She refuses. In his fury he pushes her against the railing of the balcony on the second story; it gives way and both are killed. The acting is very pretty and natural, and the story dramatic enough and clear enough to hold the interest without a break till the end. The background is apparently Southern California.

"The Temptress" (Imp).—This impressive film tells how a designing woman succeeded in separating two lovers, in separating two life-long friends, in causing a death in a duel, and in ruining another man's life, to gratify her own capricious whims. There are strongly dramatic scenes, each making the story more clear. The two friends meet at the girl's deathbed, and here the acting grows very strong in its intensity. The two fight a duel; one is shot and, dying, thrusts the woman's letter into the victor's hand, making clear to him the situation. It is very dramatic. The quality of the picture is strength. It is an eminently successful film.

"The Opium Smuggler" (American).—This is a love story, with an opium smuggler's cave in the background. It takes place on the California coast. To add to its interest, there are sea pictures both exciting and beautiful. The story is plainly told, and with very beautiful settings. The photography shows the backgrounds plainly, but the faces are very much in shadow. The story has a girl and her accepted lover to whom her father objects; he prefers the opium smuggler. The objecting father is saved from death in the sea by the girl's lover, and the treachery of the opium smuggler is then exposed at the same time. Grateful for his life, and doubly glad his daughter did not marry Laredo, the father gives his consent.

"Over the Shading Edge" (Reliance).—In this very interesting film a newspaper reporter unearths a case of bribery and graft in which her lover is the principal factor. The interest becomes deeply emotional in the closing scene when she and her lover part. It was her duty to disclose the bribery and her lover goes to prison because of it, but she loves him still and will wait till he comes out. The acting is restrained and the characters well pictured. It is an unusually strong story.

"Col. E. D. Baker, 1st California" (Champion).—Here we have a war story with plenty of action, but rather complicated. Perhaps Jim is the most interesting character. He develops a degree of bravery that wins him rapid promotion, and he returns on a furlough just in time to prevent the sheriff, his rival, from marrying the girl he loves. The battle scene, where Jim carries the colors in the very forefront of the fight, is thrilling and rouses the audience to vigorous applause. Indeed, the life and action put into the film takes a firm hold upon all who see it. It is a popular film beyond any question.

"A Village Flirt" (Eclair).—This is indeed a lively comedy. There are a young man, a flirt, and lady-killer in it. The lady-killer is given his deserts by the village girls whom he has deceived. He gets a bath in a large tub of tepid water and in that plight is made the butt of all the girls in the village. It is a pleasant bit of character drawing and the laughter was vigorous.

"Four Lives" (Imp).—This a tract, picturing the marital experiences of four different men. First is the happy home; second, the home which drink has ruined; third, the tale of a faithless wife, and fourth, the death of the loved wife. The scenes all make a deep impression, for they are well-chosen and skilfully acted. The emotions are far more deeply stirred by this picture than by the usual film.

"The Fair Dentist" (Imp).—This bit of humor deserves high commendation. It is easily the funniest thing this reviewer has seen for over a week. No one would have guessed that so much fun could be got out of a dentist chair. The reviewer wasn't the first to laugh, but he fears he laughed the loudest. When he came out of the theater and was walking along the street, he thought of it again, and the people who were passing wondered at him. The dentist really is pretty. We'd hate to have any exhibitor miss this film.

"In Sunny Italy" (Yankee).—This Italian love story has a young tourist, an American, for its hero, and a pretty Italian for heroine. They fall in love. This doesn't please the lad's mother, so she takes him by the ear; and it doesn't please the girl's Italian friend, so he throws her over the cliff. The ending is happy, for she isn't killed. The story is clearly told and lightened by quiet humor.

"The Four of Us" (Powers).—This film shows four characters, and the same after a lapse of fifteen years. Four college men upon going into the world sign an agreement to meet again in fifteen years. Three meet. The fourth is absent, until he is recognized in the burglar who forces his way into the house on the day set for the meeting of the four. It was fortunate for him, and his footsteps are turned in a better direction through the influence of the other friends. The principal interest lies in the way the changes caused by the passing years are worked out.

"Contagion" (Powers).—This film shows many people coughing. One character has a bad attack, and he spreads the trouble from one to another, and presumably it is taken up by the audience. When the policeman who arrests the coughing man begins to get sleepy while taking him in, the audience roared with laughter.

"The Railroad Builder" (Thanhouser).—This may be considered as two kinds of a film—a spectacle and a story. As a spectacle of a great conflagration, it is more remarkable than as a story, which might have been written to utilize the film showing the great fire. The object of the story is to show the kindness of rural neighbors, who start a fire in an immense pile of railroad ties to hinder the road in crossing the farm of the old man and his daughter. Yet it is a love story, too, for she falls in love with the young contracting engineer. The girl comes to his rescue and gets the aid to put out the fire. It is well acted and the exciting moments in it are admirably handled. The mechanical work is clear. The audience approved vigorously, particularly of the girl's ride for help. The conflagration scenes raise it to a very high place among the week's releases, which it never would have had without them.

"Crow's Defeat" (Bison).—Here is another Western picture, without white men. Like previous releases of this company, this picture pleased the audience. The reproduction of Western life was exciting, if not at all realistic, unless Crow Indians steal only white horses, for they picked out two white nags and left twenty blacks, which was considerate, since the Sioux needed those to ride on in a later scene. The popularity of Western pictures does not wane. Audiences applaud them, with the exception of a few theaters in New York. Outside of New York, Bison films are still quite apt to be attractions.

Civilization.

A Coming Powers Release.

There can be no doubt that civilization, in its onward march, has broken more than one stout Indian heart. In this picture we are afforded a side light on the workings of the great steam roller, known as Civilization, in its progress, which ground the Indian and his traditions into the earth. Knowing that civilization has broken the heart of many a strong Indian, it is quite conceivable that it should be the means of breaking the more tender heart of an Indian maid.

This picture is exquisitely acted and characterized. It is a consistent story, and the scenes, which have been taken out of doors, are well selected and arranged. The plot, like all good plots, is simple: An Eastern girl seeks solace for a wounded heart as a teacher of Indians in the West. She transforms one of the young braves into an up-to-date college chap. In due time the converted brave is desperately in love with his teacher; and thus did civilization break the heart of the Indian maid who had already lost her heart to the Indian brave. Her death quickly followed; but the converted brave did not realize the full significance of her death, until he saw his adored school teacher leaving for the East with her former sweetheart, who had come to kiss and make up with her, and take her back to the East. It was then that the Indian brave realized the intricacies of civilization.

The part of the Old Chief is handled with great dignity by Mr. William Raynous. Altogether, the film is consistent and interesting, and the photography is all that could be expected. The picture tells a tender story, and there is no doubt that it will appeal to all classes on account of its simple pathos.

LUBIN.

HER HUMBLE MINISTRY.—Fanny was a child of poverty, brought up in surroundings of vice and sin. She was finally committed to the House of Reform. Winnie she was taught better.

She secured a position in a restaurant. Soon after this Jim Sparks was released from one of our numerous jail terms, and rejoined his companions, who were engaged in working out the fine points of a prospective burglary. It was necessary that he had no money, so he went to a restaurant, which happened to be in the one where Fanny worked. He ate heartily and was walking out when Fanny called him back. She demanded payment, but was refused. She took the purse of his angel from the pocketbook and rang it up on the cash register. Jim left the restaurant but could not forget Fanny.

He told his companions that he must go along on any burglary. He leaves them, and waits outside the restaurant until the girl comes out, and then follows her to a bench in the park. There he tells her what he is and how sorry he is for his actions in the restaurant.

Fanny comforts him and reads him a few passages from the Bible. She gives him the sacred book and he takes it home. There he becomes absorbed in reading it. He also reads it over Jim's shoulder and an awakening takes place in both their hearts. They determined to turn from their wicked ways. Together they proceed to the restaurant and asked to be allowed to earn a meal by working an hour and they were put to work. The final scene shows them eating their first meal.

A HERO—ALMOST.—Walter and Jack were both in love with Mildred. She told them that she would marry no one but a hero. So of course it was up to them to become heroes.

Their first stunt was to rescue Mildred's little dog from being run over by an automobile. But she told them that the man she would marry must save a human life.

Next day Jack was out walking. While passing a building he heard a wild cry for help. Jack dashed into the building and saw a man attempting to strangled by a man. Bravely and fearlessly he leaped upon the villain. A moment later he was hauled upon by a crowd of angry people. Jack had interrupted the taking of a moving picture.

After he had been thrown out he was considerably disheartened with the hero business. Then he thought of a scheme whereby he could do a noble deed without any hazard to himself.

He hired a tramp to waylay Mildren as if meaning to steal her money and jewels. At the right moment Jack was to spring from his hiding to rescue her.

The plan worked out all right except that Jack was delayed in doing the rescue stunt. Walter, by a lucky chance, happened to be there and heard Mildred's cry for help. He thought that Jack had, tramp without gloves. He nearly killed the poor fellow. Jack arrived soon after and the tramp gave him a beating so that only any man could believe. In addition Jack had the sorrow to see Mildred walking off arm in arm with the real hero, Walter.

THE GAMBLER'S CHANCE.—Guy Otwell was given a tip by a friend that he buy coffee on the coffee exchange. Otwell had no money; but he mortgaged his home for $5,000. With the money in hand he tried to close the deal; but the line was busy. The hour was 2:45 p. m., and the exchange closed at 3:00. So Otwell, the office-boy, was entrusted with the money and a note to the broker, instructing him to buy coffee for the entire $5,000. Now Willie was interested in the coffee market nearly as much as in a game of "craps." Willie remembered his mission just after 3 o'clock, and rushed to the broker's and found the doors closed. He realized his predicament as he went back to tell his employer of his misfortune.

When Willie arrived at the office he was surprised to see Otwell walking up and down the room tearing his hair. Willie's employer was in a fever with immediately, so he told Otwell what he had done and returned the money to him. Then something very strange happened. Otwell found himself in the arms of his employer and heard himself being praised. Later a couple of "yellow-backs" were put in his hands.

A GOOD TURN.—John Lacy had everything that a man could desire, but there was one lack—that of a girl. One day there was a panic in the stock market and Lacy's wealth was wiped out. So great was the shock that he became ill and died in bed. But he wanted to have one last dance with his sweetheart; so he calmly dressed and proceeded to a ball.

While he was gone burglars broke into his house. Lacy discovered them on his return. He turned on the light in the library. The intruders tried to escape, but found two policemen in the street near the house. Then they were startled to find Lacy pick up a pistol and to hear him announce that he was about to end his own life. Realizing that if he did so, the policemen would hear the shot and accuse them of the crime, so they seized Lacy and gagged him. Then one of them discovered on the table the farewell note which he had written to his sweetheart, and they decided to telephone to her, since they could not escape in any other way. She came quickly and released Lacy, who then conducted the burglars safely past the policemen, everything ends happily.

PATHE.

THE ACCOMPLICE.—A beautiful actress is deeply in love with a clubman, who unfortunately was gotten entangled financially between his wife and him to pay up immediately or suffer the disgrace of being dismissed. Just before he tells his sweetheart of his predicament she has received an invitation from a wealthy baron to dine at his home after the show. She, in turn, over begs her to accept and leave a window on the lower floor open—which she does. The baron shows her his patent safe which he never locks, but which, unknown to him knows the secret, fires two shots from the interior when the door is opened. In the midst of their supper, the unwilling accomplice hears her lover stealthily creeping through the open window. Realizing that the theft is intentional, and realizing also that she cannot warn him, and yet with the desire to cover his movements so he will not be heard. In the hope that he will abandon his plan and escape, she dances for the baron's amusement, dancing ever nearer and nearer the curtains which separate her from her lover, hoping thus to be able to warn him if she can only get near enough to the unsuspecting baron. Suddenly she cry tells her, however, that her ruse has failed, and, rushing into the next room, she finds her lover dead upon the floor.

BILLY IN TROUBLE.—Billy is seen making love to two different girls at a boarding school—later he marries one and is next seen at the reception given at his house. There the old flame appears, and Billy shows great reality in greeting her. Finally Mrs. Billy, glancing in the mirror, sees the reflection of her husband with his arm about her former love. She, too, hastily dismisses them both without troubling to learn that Billy has just been favoring the lady's necklace for all the guests have left Mrs. Billy and her spouse get into another argument, which winds up with the lady thoroughly disgusted. Of course, Billy did not hurt much, but Billy makes believe he is dead, and his wife suddenly realizes that she is a murderess. Terrified she rushes through the streets. Every passing form seems to be a policeman. She does no know where to go, but finally the pangs of remorse, she enters the police station and confesses her crime. Two men are detailed to accompany her to her husband's home to arrest him. When they get there they find the remains cheerfully smoking a cigar and very much alive.

PAUL AND FRANCESCO.—This is the beautiful story of Francesca di Rimini, which is known the world over. Paul, the beautiful heroine, finally fails deeply in fore with Francesca, to whom he has been sent by his brother, Lancetto, to propose for him. Francesca consents to marry Lancetto as she is accompanied by Yani to her future husband. Paul cannot keep away from the object of his affections, and during the ceremony he disappears and ripens into an all-absorbing passion. On the trip there in the gondola he tells Francesca of his himself for the amusement of others, is really plotting dark deeds. When the lywain arrive at Rimini Francesca overhears reports concerning the true sight of her betrothed; nevertheless, they are married, and Paul, in order to stifle his love, begs of his brother to be sent on a mission, to which his brother consents. Lancetto's fool, however, has a grudge against his master, and in order to get revenge upon him, and knowing the love that Paul bears to Francesca follows Yani and persuades him to return. Yani returns to Rimini and finds Thailand the beauty of Francesca, makes love to her. The perfidious Yani repays the confidence of wife's inconstancy, and the latter enters the apartment where they are together and pierces them both with one stroke of his sword.

A CLOSE CALL.—The little station agent is deeply in love with the sheriff, and they have great sport in playing secret letters back and forth between them by using the good offices of "Bess," a fine greyhound. One day the little station agent receives a message that a gang of robbers will run a special past her station at 4.30, and just after she has received it a wife and child of one of the entered by a gang of rowdies, who promptly tie her to a chair and rifle the office. Then, seeing the message about the train, they decide to hold it up and rob it. Leaving the agent tied to her chair, they hurry down the track to accomplish their foul design. They have not taken into account, however, "Bess," who now enters and gnaws the knots binding her mistress' hands, and is soon more free. Quickly penning a note to the sheriff. Nell tells her lover of the impending danger to the pay train, and sends it by the faithful hound flying. Running down the track in the hope of flagging the train Nell is seen by the bandits, caught, knocked senseless and laid on the track of the oncoming train. The sheriff however, receives her note, and with his deputies heads off the train at the junction, boards the engine pilot, and in a most dramatic scene snatches the girl from the path of the engine and rescues her from the jaws of death in the nick of time. A good fight between the officers of the law and the bandits follows, in which they are all rounded up and promptly lugged off to the calaboose.

BIOGRAPH.

THE MANICURE LADY.—The barber was insanely infatuated with the pretty manicure lady of the tonsorial parlor, and when she cast eyes at the customers he was furious with jealous. One of the patrons of the place wins her undivided attention and she is the recipient of candy, luncheons and auto rides from him. Meanwhile the barber is wild, and the limit of his tolerance comes when she starts out on a joy ride with the favored one. Leaping on behind the car, he in jealous rage hands him a thrashing and the rival out over the back, takes his place beside his fair charmer, begging her to take the ring to proffers which she does in reward of his valor.

THE NEW DRESS.—Jose weds Marita, the little Mexican girl, and later when she accompanies him and her father to the matador's parade, which they go to sell the products of their farm. She soon gets fascinated by a pretty dress. Jose promises to buy it for one of the proceeds of the sales, and so she returns home with her father delighted at the satisfaction of Jose's bringing the dress with him. He gets the dress, but stopping at the way side inn he gives it away while under the influence of wine. He tells Marita he has lost it, but sees the dress later on another woman. The shock unbalances her mind, in which condition she remains until the advent of a little one, which restores her reason and quite blots out the thought of the dress.

KALEM.

A TRAGEDY IN TOYLAND.—At eight o'clock the children are put to bed and the nursery is deserted save for the toy soldiers and cannon cluttering the floor. When the clock strikes the waning hour of midnight the army awakens. Major Bell and Captain Spunds have been conspicuously sparing the hand. Shortly after the battle Miss Pinc, the heroine of our story, arrives with her faithful dog Fido. The two are welcomed by Miss Prue to her home. Fido brings up the rear with his tail wagging incessantly and his tongue at the port. The Major and the Captain soon become jealous of each others attentions to the charming Miss Pinc. The rivalry becomes so strong as a challenge to fight a duel is given and accepted. The surgeon, accompanied by a soldier, passes in front of Miss Prue, carrying a stretcher. The young lady that dangerous trouble is imminent, learning of the coming duel she decides to have a fight at all hazards, but arriving on the scene while the desperate rivals are deeply engaged in mortal combat, she is fatally pierced by a fatal bullet. Fido, grieving at the death of his mistress, refusing to cannot live without her, lays down his soul goes on to the dog's happy hunting ground.

IN BLOSSOM TIME.—Victorian, the belt and son of Don Pedro, a Spanish nobleman resident in Florida and a friend of Angelica, becomes enamored with love with Angelica, the gardener's daughter, a fact childhood playmate. Victorian's love at this time goes on however, the Spanish Don discovering Victorian's love affair with the gardener's daughter and orders him to renounce the girl and go with abroad. Fearing the opposition of his father and to elope with Angelica. Victorian persuades the girl to wed at once and the good priest. Father Francisco is induced to perform a secret marriage. Before the leaving of the secret wedding orders the gardener and his daughter to send Victorian away threatening to disinherit the latter if he refuses. from his door. Coerced by her father and Don Pedro, Angelica writes to Victorian, "You may be as free as before. I will see you no more. He will tell you why." Don Pedro gives the note to his son and tells him that Angelica has become tired of him and does not care to see his face again. Victorian, heart broken and pressed by his father, consents to go abroad.

Again the season of blossoms. Angelica is the mother of a sweet little child, while her husband broken husband is traveling in distant parts. In Pedro suddenly dying abroad, the sight of the blossoms brings Victorian back to Florida. Arriving at the old castle his unquenched love for the gardener's little daughter compels him to seek her. Locating the widow Angelica with her little child in the pear orchard at the identical spot where the original troth was plighted a happy reconciliation is effected.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

THE JUGGLER'S VENGEANCE.—A warrior is given employment by the proprietor of a traveling circus, and engages his service by trying persuade his employer's wife to elope with him. The husband chances to see one of their meetings, however, and engages in a fight at the performance when, as usual he displays the accuracy of his aim by throwing knives toward the shapes of his wife's hands as they are outstretched on a board he tells the traitor to take her place. This done the juggler's accurately cast knives are directed into the palms of the manhands.

Realizing that the punishment is merited the victim makes no sign and afterwards leaves the circus covering under the contemptuous glance that follow him. The wife repentant is reconciled to her husband.

FISHGUARD HARBOR, WALES.—The new British port of entry for vessels from America. It is in the westernmost part of Wales, twelve miles north of Harborsport and is connected with London by the Great Western Ry., giving excellent service.

We are shown characteristic scenes of the embarking passengers, the docks, custom house, stores, buildings, odd looking peddlers, etc.

GAUMONT.

JIMMIE ON A LARK.—He drives into the picture in a pair-horsed brougham and seeing a ragged boy dancing his legs on the coping orders the carriage to stop. Jumping out Jimmie runs to the boy, embraces him and insists upon his returning with him in the carriage to the home. They drive through the big gates to the disgust of the lodge-keeper and the boys adjourn to the grounds, where Jimmie induces his companion to change coats. Attired in the ragged coat and too large a cap, Jimmie looks a regular urchin, and finding from the boy the direction of his home, Jimmie runs off to the poor boy's father and mother, who are naturally astonished at seeing a different boy in their own child's clothes. He quickly makes himself at home and then the other boy arrives, tells his parents who the friend is, and the mother insists on taking Jimmie home. To his mother's relief he is finally brought back to the house, but before going indoors he turns back to throw a final kiss to his humble friends for a happy day.

SHOOTING THE RAPIDS.—Made at the Gorges, L'Ardeche, France, and showing the natural bridge of Arc which spans the stream at a height of 250 feet.

After an exciting trip down the rapids we shoot out into the quietly running stream and pass the Natural Fortress known as the Tower of Swallows and finish our trip at the Lovers' Fountain, which is the Mecca for the young couples of the surrounding country.

THE EMPEROR'S RETURN.—Brigadier Paoli, a former follower of Napoleon and at present commanding a detachment of the constabulary, is celebrating the betrothal of his daughter Annette to Marco, the fisherman.

Marco is late and appears to share a secret with a girl friend of Annette's. Annette notices this and sees him leave a note at the same girl's home on the following day.

Annette reads the note, in which an appointment is made for a meeting at St. Elois Bay.

The conspirators meanwhile receive a warning that Napoleon may land at the Coast of Var. This is Marco's secret. He wants to greet the Emperor and wishes the girl, whom Annette considers as her rival, to be there also.

Annette follows them and is just about to stab the girl when Napoleon arrives. Annette's jealousy fades away and with the others she salutes Him.

Then the reason for the note dawns upon her and she is happily reunited to Marco.

SWANS.—Showing the swans nest-building, the appearance of the young and the watchfulness of the parents over the fluffy little birds.

THE BANKRUPT.—Rosenau, the great banker, absorbed in his business does not see that his only daughter, Viola, and his young secretary are in love with one another.

One evening, at a festivity, a rich financier, Gober by name, is introduced to the young girl and immediately falls in love with her. He soon asks Rosenau for her hand in marriage. When Rosenau informs his daughter of the proposal she refuses to accept saying that she wishes to marry Harry Clarkson, the secretary, and no one else.

The banker sends the latter away to his uncle in Johannesburg. Gober is very angry at the refusal and swears to be avenged. Two years after by some clever moves in the Exchange he ruins the banker, Rosenau. The latter, unable to endure the disgrace, writes a letter to his daughter, saying that he is about to commit suicide and, going quietly upstairs to her room, places it on a table well lies and places the letter by the side of the bed where she is sleeping.

But the young girl awakes in time to prevent her father putting his plan into execution, and the same day Rosenau receives a telegram sent from the uncle of Harry Clarkson, his former secretary, saying that he has just returned from Johannesburg with Harry. They have discovered an important new gold mine and he will give Viola a wedding present of half a million sterling.

MELIES.

THE REDEMPTION OF RAWHIDE.—Rawhide, Arizona, was certainly some tough town when Reverend Simpson first blew in from civilization and started in the work of redemption. From Alkali Ike to Shorty Smith, not a man of them had seen the inside of a church in fourteen years, these two parties excepted, preached in the county, and the only hymns that had ever been heard were those of the coyotes.

The Rev. Simpson soon set up the "Rawhide Mission" but in spite of the hot weather, the result was a heavy frost. Nobody came even as far as the door except Black Mike, who was drunk and who thought he was at the XXX saloon.

The worthy pastor pleaded, prayed and billed the town without result. He undertook a one-man raid on the River King club-room, but soon landed among the gals in the street. He was in despair and the redemption of Rawhide seemed a long way off. Just at his darkest hour, however, his daughter came to town to assist him. The results were magical.

The boss straightened up and brushed up. They didn't back down on the sermon he certainly were strong for Sunday School, where Mary taught. Mary had the Bible class and they were all in it. The town soon turned temperance and the faro dealer made a shack to stock collection for the brethren.

At length, they all wanted to make love to the teacher, and to prevent a riot she agreed to keep company with the one that learned the most scripture texts. The result was the hottest contest ever known in the West, and it turned out —well, it turned out to the satisfaction of all concerned.

SELIG.

DISCHARGING THE COOK.—Husband, wife and two children complete the household. All is not tranquil, for he finds fault with dinner and order the cook fired. This duty is assigned to his wife, who fails to appreciate the work that she is discharged on the other hand, gives an athletic demonstration of her spitting ability. Then the leaves head of the family wanders forth, only to meet his Waterloo. The kids do their part. The boy pup chases her through the window, and dynamite is used to blow up the cook stove, when at last an armistice of the warring factions is arranged and the rambunctious cook departs in peace.

DEAR, KIND HUBBY.—The wife being ill, he demonstrates his ability to assume charge of the kitchen, and the soon reserves itself into a state of turmoil, destruction and desperation for his knowledge as a chef is limited to being able to distinguish the difference between a dog potato and a sensitive bean.

When the smoke clears away on the close of the first scene the carnage is appalling, and the once shining remaining untainted is the fly paper.

In desperation he calls upon the employment agency for reinforcements. A cook is sent. Joy again reigns supreme.

THE STILL ALARM.—John Bird and Franklyn Fordham were business partners in some line. The item being on the verge of bankruptcy caused in every way to embrace the last prestige. Fordham, a man of honor in all his dealings, and pictured as a fond and devoted father to make due restitution of and assigned all of the assets to the unscrupulous plotting of Bird. The result was the great Johnstown Monterey that just battles the power for years. Bird, seeing the ruin of the concern, had the valuables and deposited in the firm's safe before Johnstown's death. While Fordham became prostrate, his former partner became a renegade and fell lower and lower as the years rolled on. Finally the cherished daughter of Fordham was discovered by womanhood and had formed over some unperceived when Jack Mackey, the Kentucky's son, came into her life. He was made a humble employee of her father's and became a favorite, for his good and lovable qualities. Mark days ensued when Bird had returned and threatened the peaceful serenity of Fordham's home. Jack was called to the rescue and he fought with Bird. To shield the family from the scandal, Bird's disgrace he is forced to accompany Jack from his employ and together they go to the Klondike to seek their fortune. After a few months of disappointment and search for work Jack in some luck sets on and finds the partners gone. He soon sold his find and returned with his cash, found to find the presence of mind a newspaper with another the successful news of Fordham's success in the Klondike. He immediately sets out to seek him. At the same time a newspaper in the Klondike reaches Fordham and he reads of Jack's success. Fordham leaves for the latter and reaches the same steamer on the return trip. Bird, who has also read the news, leaves for Jack's claim and reaches it before Jack arrives. He finds the claim is worthless and

IN AND AROUND HAVANA, CUBA.—We first approach the city on a steamer, getting a wonderfully clear panorama of the city of Havana. Upon reaching the city, we are introduced to the principal squares and some of the most important buildings, including the cathedral of Columbus, the oldest church in Cuba.

We land near the place where political prisoners were shot from 1895 to 1898.

After several beautiful views of different points in Havana, we are shown the Prado, which is a number of attractive scenes. The film closes with a beautiful view of moonlight over the harbor.

HOW THE HUNGRY MAN WAS FED.—Young Van Bibber is on the way down town one day when he notices a typical "Weary Wanderer" following him and begging money for something to eat. Van Bibber hands him a half-dollar. The tramp continues to do this sort of thing for some little time. He is now seen outside a restaurant, begging and again he asks Van Bibber for money, who happens to be going into the place for a meal. He is dragged into the place by Van Bibber who orders them to bring the hungry man a good meal.

A big spread is quickly set before the tramp, who chokes and coughs all through the meal as though it were poison. Unable to keep up his deception longer, he starts for the door, but Van Bibber, anticipating his move, calls in a passing policeman. Exercised by the place to be fed, he formed a circle around the thoroughly disgusted tramp, who is compelled to pay for his meal and to tip the waiter with the dollar and a half given him by Van Bibber, who smilingly makes his way through the admiring crowd and out into the street, satisfied that the hungry man was fed.

A CASE OF HIGH TREASON.—We are introduced to Captain North, who, together with two other rogues, the crime of high treason against his own country. The time is just prior to the beginning of the Spanish war.

He is also plotting to make sure of his own safety by placing the guilt upon the shoulders of another officer, Lieutenant Brewster, and this he effectively does, causing the arrest of the young Lieutenant. The Lieutenant makes his escape to Cuba and Havana as a condemned criminal. Deprived of the rights of his native land, he joins the Cuban Insurrection Republic, and amid the rise and fall of the country, eventually becomes Secretary and Confidential Adviser of the President. In the line of capacity that he meets Helen, the daughter of the millionaire, Clifford Norman. The sudden arrival of Captain North on the scene disrupts all his hopes of good luck, and Brewster feels the humiliation of being accused as an accomplice of traitors and handed with the crime of high treason before the woman he loves, and she in turn believes it true. North in time bids fair to win the girl, but Fate steps in to marriage, when in the heat of temper aroused by a seeming imaginary affront, he grossly insults His Excellency, Juan Domigo.

The next day, without so much as by your leave, North finds himself arrested and condemned to die. This act Helen attributes to Brewster by way of revenge, but when the latter learns the truth of North's arrest, his nobility of character stands forth, and he forces a release pardon from President Domigo at the point of a pistol, thereby saving the escape of his worst enemy. He rescues the girl he loves from the hands of Domigo's soldiers and finally proves his innocence, and wins the love of the woman of his heart.

CAPTAIN NELL.—Harry, the only son of Howard Randolph, is cursed with a love for the drama. His father calls him to task and he promises to reform. The promise is soon broken, however, and he is carousing with some friends in a cafe, when he protests Nell, a Salvation Army lassie from insult at the hands of one of her companions.

He calls upon his father one day in an intoxicated condition. This so angers the old man that he disowns him and drives him out.

Weak from hunger, one day, he drifts into a saloon and staggers to a table. Here he is found by Nell, who recognizes him as her former champion and pleads with him to accompany her.

Three years pass by. Harry has proved himself a man and become one of the best workmen in a large manufacturing concern. He and Nell have married and are living happily in their little home, whose shining light is Harry Junior, now almost two years old.

While at work one day a sign is posted in the shop saying that the company has sold the plant to Howard Randolph, and that he will take possession immediately.

Randolph decides to reduce expenses and posts a notice that all wages will be reduced ten per cent. The workmen at once appoint a committee to wait upon Mr Randolph, and, not recognizing that he be his son, make him chairman.

Their visit Randolph and father and son come face to face. Harry pleads the cause of the workmen but Randolph remains firm and refuses their demands, and they leave.

When they have gone he turns to his old clerk, Griggs, who has been Harry's friend in all his trials, and demands an explanation. Griggs then tells him of Harry's splendid work, his little home and of his wife and son. This so pleases Randolph that he insists that Griggs lead him to Harry's home.

Nell's charm soon convinces him that Harry has made a wise choice, and handling her and his grandson into the auto, he goes to the shop and sends for his son. When he appears Randolph goes to the sign, writes the word "Increased" in place of "Reduced" adds "A Son" to the signature and offers his hand to his son, who warmly clasps it.

MADELINE'S REBELLION.—Madeline and her sister Mildred, two American girls, live in the home of an old General, who is their legal guardian. Happiness reigns supreme until the arrival of a nephew, after an absence of several years, writes that he is coming to visit Military School. His trunk precedes him by four hours.

Mildred and Madeline happen to be in the hallway when the expressman with his assistant arrives and lugubriously unloades the straps. The cover opens result in the discovery of a uniform and the girls begin to rummage in the trunk, with the result that Madeline finds a letter written by her guardian to his nephew stating that if he is wise that the latter marry his ward, Madeline.

Never having seen the young man, she naturally rebels, and then and there vows to run away. Her sister, having her confidence and sympathy, decides to go with her. Having a strong desire for adventure, they pass as young men and, thus attired, come face to face with their guardian's nephew before he has left the hallway.

The girls have a fine time as men and manage to keep up the deception for an hour, when the General, who has traced them, appears upon the scene and mistakes his nephew and chum for the girls in disguise. Madeline becomes angry at the latter's comments, but after due explanation the runaways are forgiven, and Madeline finds herself in love with the young man her guardian intended she should marry. Thus the General's wish is fulfilled and all return home to live happy ever after. Madeline had the novel experience of being a man for an hour.

WHEN A MAN'S MARRIED.—Jack Howard, through hard work, has at last placed himself in a comfortable financial position to marry his dear little wife, Mabel, located in a little apartment with all the comforts of home. He is very anxious to enlarge his field. The stork has been too great, however, and he is almost on the verge of nervous prostration, sick and penniless. Mabel tries to cheer and comfort him; she waits on him and is a truly good and faithful wife, very much concerned about her husband's health. She sends for the doctor, and after he has gotten permission from his employer, she, with a basket packed with his grub, goes to her home when he thinks of his camera, with which he promises to take some scenes of the location where he is employed as cameraman.

When he gets on the train, he happens to meet an old friend, a newspaper man, who has been assigned to the same locality for which he is to take place later in the week. They compare camera and the knowledge of the country and out of town. Jack enjoys his vacation and he does not forget to make good use of his camera, taking many beautiful scenes, including a number of photographs of the natives. His friend, the newspaper man, has filled his commission, taking some photographs of the members of a burlesque company, and he is quite satisfied with his success. By a strange coincidence, Jack and the reporter return to their home again meet on the same train, and again tell their experiences during their week's outings.

Arrived at their respective homes, Jack and Mabel, by mistake exchange cameras. Jack leaves his films at the newspaper's to be developed and goes to meet his wife, who is very glad to see him back again looking so well, and asks him if he has brought with him the photographs of his trip. He replies very enthusiastically about them and tells her the proofs will be home in a short time. A messenger boy comes in with the pictures, and Jack and dear wife shows them to his wife she is horrified to see several views of an actress in tights and scanty attire, in bewitched skirts; no amount of explanations will console her, and it is not until his newspaper friend, who has discovered that he got Jack's and Mabel's photographs instead of his own, comes into the house, sets the whole matter straight, and restores peace to the family.

THE SHOW GIRL.—Audrey, a charming actress, but classed among the show girls, is in love with some of her stage admirers, who have lunch with an old friend, by the name of Dr. Renfrew. The doctor calls Audrey, whom he knows in her old home days and renew their friendship; she takes his attentions seriously and becomes very much impressed with his pleasing personality.

Night after night the doctor attends the performances in which she appears as "The Show Girl," never fails to greet her with generous applause and a bouquet of flowers as marks of his admiration. To strengthen the friendship, Audrey invites him to spend her a string of pearls, begging her to accept it as a souvenir of happy days gone by.

A Thanksgiving number in a company in which she is playing, she learns that Dr. Renfrew is married, and at her friend's suggestion decides to pay him a visit at his home. The next morning she goes to his home when his family is absent, confronts him with his duplicity, and tells him about returning the pearls. While she is there his wife rings the bell and Audrey pretends to be a patient of the doctor's; the wife unsuspecting, comes into the room with the morning's mail, among which is the redirected note. He opens it, the wife asks him to let her see it; he hesitates. "The Show Girl" takes the box of pearls from the bosom of her dress and places it on the table. Then slipping from the room, she leaves the doctor and his wife alone. He gives the note to his wife and she reads "Dear little girl: Accept this string of pearls as a souvenir of happy days gone by." Then he hands his wife the box of pearls.

A fellow returns to the theater and in her dressing-room alone, weeps in sorrow with heart breaking sobs for the wife who is not worthy of her love with which he trifled, and which prompted her to save him from disgrace and his family from scandal.

SUNSHINE AND SHADOW.—Way down South in the days of the aristocracy, there dwelt a lady named Mrs. Gilbert, and "Sunshine" was the name of her adopted daughter. This lady's husband, who dwelt upon the Gilbert plantation with her little daughter named Shadow, Sunshine is as fair and as white as a lily while Shadow is as dark and black as night. The dear child is not only blessed with good looks, but she is surrounded by the blessings of material comfort; poor little Shadow can boast of nothing, not even her looks.

Sunshine is given a birthday party, and all her little friends are invited to join in the fun. Shadow peeps through the window and casts longing eyes for their pretty dresses and sweet faces, and wonders why she was created such a funny-looking little doll with no clothes like her playmates were made so attractive. This remains an unsolved problem, and gives her up in despair. She is not then invited to the party. She cannot control her curiosity and when she sees a chance sneaks into the parlor, hides under the piano and looks on until the other children depart for their homes. Sunshine, during the serving of the dinner, is afraid some one will get a beautiful doll from the Christmas tree and hides it under the sofa, right next to the hiding Shadow, who, when she sees her little friend coming out of her hiding place, she runs to her little cabin home and falls asleep in an old arm chair before the fire.

As she is about to go to bed, Sunshine asks for her doll, and tells her father and the nurse that it is under the sofa in the parlor. Of course they cannot find it, at once raise a hue and a cry and then suspect Shadow. When Shadow's mammy overhears their suspicion and hurries home, where she finds her little daughter asleep with the doll in her arms. A beautiful picture of the two causes the doll, throws it in the fire and replaces it with the wooden one. Shadow, in which the beautiful dressed girl had cherished as her one prized possession; but in comparison to Sunshine's is only a makebelieve.

ALKALI IKE'S AUTO.—Both "Alkali" and "Mustang" Pete loved Betty Brown, and the lady had her hands full trying to prevent the two cowboys from each other. One day "Alkali" called on Betty with a pair of handsome saddle horses and asked her to go riding with him. She agreed, of course—for "Mustang," driving up with a handsome horse and carriage, carried off the lady. "Alkali" goes to the village hotel, indulges in drink, which is to death, but finally trades for an old junk automobile that is noisy, and clambering aboard, he starts in pursuit of his rival and the lady. Overtaking them, he has no difficulty in persuading Betty to ride with him. He has not gone far when he and "Alkali," endeavoring to fix it, turns on the juice and the rattle-trap car starts down the trail at lightning speed, "Alkali" and Betty after. After a thrilling and exciting ride the car is ditched and poor Betty is thrown landing into the road.

THE ATONEMENT.—Philip Gray is the owner of a number of East Side tenement buildings in New York City. Despite the censure of the press and the pleadings of his tenants to repair the buildings, the banker refuses. His wife reads a paragraph in a paper about the mysterious death of Thomas Gray for the death of women and children in his tenements, and decides to investigate the conditions. She goes to the East Side and visits one of the buildings and explores its dark passages from top to bottom and is horrified at the misery of the people abiding there. Entering one of the apartments, Mrs. Gray and Dorothy find a sick child of the same age as Dorothy, who, upon hearing that the child has symptoms of diphtheria, leave the room. Dan Morris, father of the sick child, is advised by the charity physician to get a specialist in children's diseases, who alone will be able to save the girl's life. Without wasting hope Dan goes to the office of the specialist, where he comes face to face with the banker Gray, who also is seeking the aid of the specialist for Dorothy, who has contracted diphtheria through her visit to Morris' sick child. Both men are pleading with the doctor when the telephone rings and Gray is informed that Dorothy is dead. The doctor then goes with Morris and saves the child's life, and Gray, after having experienced a change of heart through the death of his daughter, repairs his tenements.

THE SHERIFF'S CAPTIVE.—Dan Hawkins, a rancher of Skull Valley, Arizona, going to the postoffice for his mail, recognizes a man standing near, pulls his gun, shoots the man down and rides hastily away.

The loitering cowpunchers hasten with news of the tragedy to the home of Fred Weller, the sheriff, who bidding his mother good-bye, saddles his bronchs, and is off on the trail of the assassin.

Neil, Hawkins' daughter, awaits her father's return, and greets him joyfully. He is much depressed, and thrusting a note into her hand, bids her good-bye and rides away. Neil reads the note:

My Dear Daughter—Fifteen years ago your mother ran away with another man. Today I killed him. I have made provision for your future. I am leaving this country. Good-bye. Your Father.

The sheriff reaches Hawkins' cabin and encounters Neil, who denies knowledge of the whereabouts of her father. Weller, however, discovers the hoofprints of Hawkins' horse, and starts on the trail. The next evening, by aid of his field glasses, he discovers Hawkins asleep, his horse unsaddled standing near. He stealthily pilfers the sleeping man, secures his gun and takes him prisoner. Hawkins pleads to be permitted to see his daughter. Arriving at the cabin, Neil and her father go inside, while Weller, exhausted from many hours in the saddle, drops upon a bench and is soon fast asleep. Neil comes from the cabin, purloins from the sheriff the key to the handcuffs, releases her father who rides away, she placing the handcuffs upon her own wrists. Weller awakens and is astounded. The girl tells him what she has done, and demands that she be taken in her father's stead.

THE RANCHMAN'S VENGEANCE.—Lorenz Pedro, a Mexican halfbreed, owns a small sheep ranch, and lives happily with his wife Marie and little daughter Lois.

One exceedingly hot afternoon, Tom Flint, riding across the ranch in search for cattle, is overcome by the heat, and Pedro, acting the part of a good Samaritan, takes him to his home, where Marie, through careful nursing, soon has him quite himself again.

Pedro sets out daily with his flock, leaving Marie and Flint together, offering an opportunity which Flint unscrupulously takes advantage of, resulting in his completely winning Marie's love. Manuelito, Marie's father, is suspicious, and comes upon them while Flint is declaring his love. He goes to Pedro in the field and tells what he has seen and heard. Hastening home he finds his wife in Flint's embrace, and in his grief at Marie and Flint's faiters for a moment, and falls dead at his feet. Flint is terror stricken. At the point of a gun Pedro summarily marches him off to a high cliff overlooking the sea. Here Pedro tosses away his gun and a terrible hand to hand combat ensues, ending when Flint is thrown from the cliff to a watery grave. The death of Marie is avenged.

A MATRIMONIAL SURPRISE.—John Wiss is the president of the Welzenheimer Club and therefore conscious of his own wisdom. One of his strong points is his single blessedness, and he laughs derisively at his married friends. At the club's regular poker session he sees frequent interruptions by the cruel waves of mendacity, but John, all the three hundred pounds of him, sits contentedly by and pokes fun at them for their fate.

But his fate finally comes and his fall is ignominous. He marries a little woman, a ninety-pound bantam, and what she doesn't do to poor John is a caution. She tames him to such an extent that the time he used to spend at the club is now consumed in useful activity at a wash tub, and John dare not deny her orders, either. The grand climax to his fate is shown when, in the appropriate attire, he is protesting governess to a bawling, yelling twin.

It's shortly after that Rance is dispossessed, and determines to cross into Oklahoma. Here he takes his chance in the homestead lottery, and sure enough 1607 is one of the winning numbers. But the sheriff interferes, claiming that the ticket is non-transferable, and that Dolly is not the original owner. It looks pretty blue, but Jack Dave wants to see his little present reach home, so he takes a daring chance by showing up and backing up the ownership of the lottery ticket, winning the home for Dolly, and Dolly for himself.

THANHOUSER.

LADY CLARE.—Tennyson's poem of "Lady Clare" tells of a nurse. Alice, employed by the Earl to nurse his motherless infant daughter—the little Lady Clare.

Alice has a child of her own, also a baby girl, but when the Earl's little one dies, Alice substitutes her own child, which is brought up in luxury as the Earl's daughter, and in time inherits his vast estate.

Lord Ronald, the Earl's next of kin, who is really the rightful heir, spends his every hour in close companionship with Alice's daughter, and when they are grown, this friendship develops into love.

When Alice learns that her daughter is to be the wife of Lord Ronald, she confesses her deception, but realizing that her daughter is in love with Ronald, refuses to use this confession to deceive and cheat Lord Ronald, tells him she is "a beggar maid," and not the Lady Clare."

Ronald, loving her for herself alone, assures her that her rank matters nothing to him.

THE COLONEL AND THE KING.—Upon the death of his grandfather, little George IV of Saxonia ascends the throne at the age of seven. His father, however, is a short one, as a usurper, backed by a number of native soldiers, attacks the palace, captures the boy king and seizes the reins of government.

King George is ordered executed in secret, but the man hired to do the vile deed, is so touched by the youth and innocence of the little King, that instead of slaying him, he spirits him away to safety. Fearing that if discovered his life would be forfeited, the brave places the young King with emigrants to whom he is known only as "Colonel" for America. Arriving in New York, King George makes his escape, and hides in the city until a companion ship can be shipped to a town in the west for which she is ticketed. The following day, a little ragged boy is found asleep in the street by a city policeman. In spite of his protestations, he is shipped out West, according to the directions on the immigration ticket that is found on him.

Deposited on a lonely railroad station out West, the boy becomes thoroughly frightened, and eagerly seeks the protection of an army colonel, in command of a nearby fort, who meets the train at the station and is greatly taken with his winning ways.

George's assertion that he is a king, is treated as a joke by the officers and men at the Fort, but by the time the Colonel, who grows fonder of him every day.

When some time later, a delegation arrives from the boy's kingdom, having traced him by the ring of identity he established, they bring him news of the insurrection, and the capture of the man who usurped his throne. But the little King promptly abdicates, saying he would rather grow up to be an American soldier. The disappointed delegates are forced to return home without him.

THE STAGE CHILD.—The husband was not cruel, but was what is called a "good provider," for he provided realized that his wife needed more substance to spend money. And when she found that she could earn a good living because of her excellent voice, she left him, taking their baby daughter along. Then she found an opera company, and, by the cool, appealing Archibald method, in six years later she found that her voice was dying her, and the skilled physician who was called in was forced to tell her that she had lost her power it again.

Then the day she fell from the proud position as star to that of a woman with no prospects. A little daughter felt sorry for "Mammie," and sang to the theater, applied for a position as usher. And it was promptly given to her.

On the last night of the performance Archibald met a child of her tender years like no right amongst upon the stage.

She child applied upon the Mayor, and expressed her opinion of a statute that would prevent a little girl from supporting her sick mother. The Mayor he was by her eloquence, and went to see the mother. Then he realized why he had taken such a keen to the little girl. He and his wife naturally their own child, and their home is much happier the it was when they "just drifted along."

AT RICH QUICK.—A young workingman, with a ready for work and the will to be the credit to Saturday, is thoroughly happy, but the woman is not. He buys her splendid clothes and for her surroundings he constantly toils and prays that his great fortune will knock at their door.

One of Jack's friends is a shifty individual, who lets by his wits. With another acquaintance he makes a get-rich-quick scheme that promises great returns to the promoters. The scheme appeals to the workingman with them, figuring that his fortune is made, and the confidence that his fellow knows repose in him will be a valuable asset.

The young man refuses, but his wife insists him that the world owes him a living, so that she wants to be somebody, and not a nobody. And to fulfill her dreams he succumbs to the other propositions of its kind, this is a simple from the start. The crooks regard every that comes to as ducks, and present money out by false promises of wonderful profits to takes his share of the loot, and his wife finds the new dress as she wishes, but what she was, and meet the people she desires to know before she is happy.

But the full nature of his crime is brought home to Jack when a poor widow calls to tell him that his partners have vanished and that every cent the old woman has in the world is swept away. She is friendless, too old to work, and also has a tiny grandchild dependent upon her. Jack, realizing that he is responsible for blasted lives and ruined homes, is convinced that he has paid too large a price for the jewels and gowns of his wife. Remorseful, he decides to die.

His wife comes to him just in time to save his life. She demands an explanation, and he tells her. She tears off her gems, expresses sorrow for her selfishness, and declares that she hates the world together.

Jack makes restitution to his dupes so far as he is able and through the intercession of the old widow, they agree to give him a fresh start. And as a result of his experience, he is now and his wife realizing that there is sorrow and seldom happiness in money made dishonestly.

REX.

AN EXCEPTION TO THE RULE.—Dorothy has implicit faith in her husband, and when an old friend of theirs, a bachelor, pays a call, the first topic of discussion is Dorothy's husband. Dorothy describes him as something indeed unusual in masculinity for her friend Helen seems to think they are all just about the same, all weak, all need watching. To prove her point, she says she will send a note to Dorothy's husband, whom she has never seen, telling him that she has admired his picture and asking for a meeting. The note is sent for identification he was to wear a white flower in his coat buttonhole, and with whom he will wear one. The note is put on the husband's desk. He enters in company with a friend, a traveling salesman, from whom he buys a necktie, and when he asks his friend's opinion. His friend thinks enough of it to carry out the girl's instructions, and does so. Then the bubble commences to burst as in his wife's birthday and he goes to a florist and announces that he has a gift a present. The florist pins a white flower on his coat lapel with his compliments. Hubby proceeds home and when he enters the door it occurs to him that he has forgotten the plant, and he is about to leave the house to go after it when Dorothy enters and invites him to stay. Helen, seeing the white flower on her unaware that he will be back in a little bit. The widget looks as well as the white flower, almost convinces Dorothy that her husband has accepted the invitation.

Helen, the bachelor girl goes to the park and meets the man whom she supposes to be Dorothy's husband. She does not hesitate to tell him what she thinks of him in deceiving his wife, and he finds it impossible to explain to her the joke. Hubby returns home and finds the coast clear and his wife in tears instead of greeting him with smiles. A few minutes later, the bachelor girl comes in and by her actions gives a confirmation to Dorothy's husband, who is entirely a different man than the one meet to the park. Jack's pal, the traveling salesman, comes in and a general explanation follows.

TAE MINOR CHORD.—Carl Dunmitt, a poor but talented violinist, engages a room in an obscure boarding house, and becomes a fellow guest.

Gretchen Blecker, resides across the street, and through the open window where she is wont to sit, hears the violin music and falls in love.

One day while Gretchen is listening, she knocks over a plant. The musician hastens out, picks up the flower, and thus they meet and go for a stroll.

Carl receives an offer to play at a society benefit for charity, and Gretchen is invited. His happiness is of short duration, for he realizes that he has not the proper clothing to appear at the benefit.

Gretchen has been hoarding her money, and offers to make it up to him for his sake. He gives him her little savings of months and he is attached to make a presentable appearance at his debut. His fine public appearance brings him prominence. He is invited to the homes of the wealthy. He forgets the young girl who was kind to him in his poverty and he meets and falls in love with Marie von Ritmore, the daughter of the woman who thus brought him out.

Gretchen, pining for her lover, gradually wastes away in strength. On the eve of dying she expresses a wish to hear once more and hear the sweet tones of his violin. Her mother seeks her out, finding him at the home of his mentor, surrounded by admirers. She is persistent in her request to see him and is finally admitted. She implores him to come to her daughter. Marie grows the situation and urges him to go to the bedside of the girl and he does so, accompanied by his fiancee.

Thus find Gretchen dying. She holds out her arms to Carl and he takes to him, happy enough in the knowledge that he loses her and is ignorant of his vows to Marie. It is all explained to Marie and she bids her lover make the girl his wife. A marriage ceremony is hastily performed and then Carl plays as he has never played before. Gretchen expires in an ecstasy of joy to the strains of her favorite melody.

THE FORGED DESPATCH.—Jack Hoskins and Jim Darrow are rivals for the hand of Bess Kemp. Hoskins is the favored suitor, whereat Darrow is furious.

Fort Sumter is fired upon and there is a call for volunteers. A company is formed and Jack Hoskins is made Captain. Dyke, the brother of Bess, was enlisted as drummer boy. Jim Darrow applies and is duly made a member of the company.

The scene reverts to the front with Jack and a small body of men fighting desperately to hold an outpost against the onslaughts of the enemy. Jim Darrow is despatched with an order for reinforcements. At a lonely spot on the road he reads the note and supposes it to be humiliating to Jack.

He forges a despatch ordering Jack to retreat. Jack does so, with little base by his side.

A shell explodes near them and the son of Jack is torn off and Dave receives a mortal wound. Jack is in the act of stooping over the boy to see if when he is struck by the missile, but if broke to the ground. The boy staggers towards him and, in a dazed condition, gives the despatch in his pocket, being unable to reach Jack and falls dead. Jack, recovered from his wound, with an empty sleeve, is summoned before his fellow officers, courtmartialed and sent home, branded as a coward on the evidence of Darrow.

The scene reverts to the North. An officer brings the coat and cap worn by Dave to Bess and gives her a letter from Jack in which he writes that he has been proven a coward and releases her from their engagement.

Twenty years have now passed. It is Memorial Day and the Union survivors of the war are having their annual parade.

In her home Bess, now a saddened unmarried woman, sees the old soldiers march past. She gets the clothing of Dave from his mother, who waves out of the window and the forged despatch drops out of the pocket where it has lain so long. She reads with dilated eyes and then rushes to the street.

Jack is surprised to find his old comrades at his window willing for him to come out. He is told the forged despatch has been found which proves his innocence. He rushes from his house to clasp Bess in his arms and is just in time to see the head of the soldiers in command. Three rousing cheers are given for Captain Jack Hoskins, and the old veterans march away.

The closing scene is at the cemetery with Jack and Bess decorating the graves of Dave, with the grizzled veterans in the background.

CHAMPION.

IN THE GREAT BIG WEST.—Harold Walters, a young playwright, is in love with Dorothy Desmond. Harold has arranged to meet Dorothy at a ball. He is there promptly on time to do so but he suddenly remembers that at the same hour a patient is expecting him at his home. He leaves Dorothy, but duty is all paramount with him; he must go to his patient.

The scene shifts to the West. Dorothy has gone there on a visit to relatives. The young doctor, seeking an outlet for his energies, goes there also.

At the bedside of a patient, he meets his old sweetheart. That meeting is a most joyous one. Indeed, for Dorothy has never ceased to love the rad and ladler pasting, that her sweetheart is more worthy to be loved.

WITH SHERIDAN AT MURFREESBORO.—George Wentworth, a Tennessean lived with his parents near the home of his sweetheart, Marion Caldwell. In 1861, however, War had broken out between North and South and George's father had obtained an appointment for him in the Southern Army and summoned him home from West Point. But the joy of the old patriot was turned to grief, for his son refused to don the gray.

He appeared to the youth but George was firm in the belief that the Stars and Stripes meant an indissoluble Union. At the enraged father's command, he leaves his beloved's home to give his life if need be for his principles.

And the suffering and hunting of the fiery vortex of war brings these two-brother and sweetheart together on the battlefield of Murfreesboro, at his son.

Then a message arrived from the wife and mother, ill unto death, each word depicting her agony and crying out for her boy and his father. George reads the letter and, with a cry of despair, he thrusts his revolver into his parent's hand, who half dazed, rushes forth to the side of his wife.

The old man finds his wife unconscious. Brother and George is immediately summoned and sentenced to be shot at sunrise. His father sees in a vision all his wife's tenderness, sees his love lost to his association. With sudden haste he springs to his feet crosses the room and, throwing the pistol that lies near the dying wife, he rushes to the battlefield to his son. With a cry of despair he wand, bearing his son in the ground and sustaining him with his own body, as the death wolves clasp on every side, he fires his last shot.

Crowded wounded before Sheridan, the old soldier tells the truth. George is restored, with unsullied honor, to his former rank and his father found on parole.

NESTOR.

HIS SECOND CHOICE.—Stanley leaves the only son of wealthy parents, to lead Dorothy Dashing Ethel Dewsbury is the object of his youthful adoration. In order to put an end to his romance, the mother manages to get Stanley go to the country on an extended vacation.

At the country boarding house Stanley meets a collection of threescore young folks; he also mesmerizes them. Murdock, the village belle, who promised by fates to wed with him. As for Shadow, she soon falls victim to the fascinations of the country maid.

Her latest romance have ceased, and wedding Mr. and Mrs. Dawson that the said maiden be purchased for she for to be soon to marry Piera Mitzeski Conservatorium takes possession of the Baldwin home-stead, and to a wedding most Papa Haymes takes the last train for the village, where his hopeful son is passing away the time. He arrives in time to quell a tumult at the course of true love never did run smooth, and autobiography of old Jew have a habit of assuming an wrong manner. The old gentlemanes advent proves a blessing in disguise for he sees at once that the affection of her Shadow is not same to make his disdainful tears up Hazel's picture and feeds them to his breast.

YANKEE.

THE LITTLE WESTERN ROSE.—Rose Martin is loved by Ham Bolton, a young cattle man, but Rose prefers Jack Bennet, employed by her father. Jack arouses the enmity of Bolton and who picks a quarrel with Jack. A fight ensues in which horsetrick. Bolton makes a lucky throw and draws Jack from his mount and starts over the prairie dragging the helpless body behind his cruel steed.

Rose suspected trouble and has ridden in the direction in which she saw them disappear and she comes upon the scene as Jack unconscious, is being dragged to his death, and riding hard she mounts them and at the point of gun forces Bolton to halt. Later, as her father discovers that his daughter loves Jack, he prevents on his wife to give their daughter and Jack their blessing.

Bolden, learning of this, sends a Mexican cattle puncher with a decoy note to the girl, which he meets some distance from the ranch with her horse and bolting. Suspecting no harm she follows the Mexican, who takes her to a deserted cabin, and in, then rides off to inform Bolden that the Mexican overlooked "Yank," the dog, who attacks the door of the shack where the unfortunate is prisoner.

Rose writes a note, which she forces out through a small crack in the door, to the dog securing it in his mouth and dashes off with the note to the ranch house and places it in the hands of Rose's mother, whom he sees at the door. She summons her husband and shows him the note, which notifies them that she is held a prisoner. The dog leads them to the shack and Rose is released. She then tells her story to the boys, who start out to round up Bolden and his Mexican, which they soon succeed in doing and roping them with lariats, they force the two wortldes to go to the ranch and at the point of guns they compel them to be married to Rose and Jack. The last scene shows the young couple ready to be married.

THWARTED BY NELL PIERCE.—Nell has undertaken to run down a band of jewel thieves, who take to sea in a sailing yacht and is followed by Nell Pierce in a motor boat. She runs down the yacht and the thieves attempt to board the motor boat, but Nell's quick eye has taken in the action and notes the location where the jewels went over.

Nell meets with a series of startling adventures and is captured, but eventually makes her escape. In the meantime she has trailed the thieves to the home of a marine diver, whom they engage to go down and recover the jewels. The diver and his assistant proceed out to sea and get ready to go overboard when Nell, with an assistant, overhaul the diver's craft just as they are ready.

The Captain and his assistant are overpowered and bound and Nell Pierce takes the diver's outfit, gets into it while her assistant screws on the head piece. She is then assisted overboard and sinks to the bed of the ocean and spies a long search, finds the jewels and is pulled aboard.

GREAT NORTHERN.

THE VOICE OF CONSCIENCE.—The foreman at a large works is discharged, and he vows vengeance to those under him, and resolves to revenge himself on his former employer. He constructs an infernal machine and when the bomb is set by the time fuse, the miscreant shows himself to his enemy's little girl and gives her the bomb as a toy. The man then goes. The father, coming in to the house, does not know what the strange object is that her child is holding. However, she is suspicious, she throws it out of the window, and just then it explodes. Part of the house is blown down, but fortunately the inmates are unhurted. Later in his own room, the perpetrator of the crime sees in a vision the child for whose death he supposes himself to have been responsible, and the constant recurrence of the vision nearly drives him mad. Meanwhile, the police are hot foot on his track. The child's description is recognized by the father as that of his ex employee, and the man is soon found and arrested. In his cell he seems likely to loose his reason, so in mercy, the child is brought to him, and in a superbly acted scene, the prisoner convinces himself that the apparition is flesh and blood. Deeply touched, the father forgives, and promises that when the unhappy man has paid the penalty of his crime, he will befriend him.

Waterproof Facts

Rainy films are a great drawback to a photo-play entertainment.

Even the highest price service includes a few reels of more or less uncertain age and are generally badly scratched.

The scratches are invariably filled with dirt. This is what gives the pictures the appearance of having been photographed during a rainstorm.

To wash these films with water would ruin the emulsion; to clean them in alcohol makes them brittle.

To meet this situation The National Waterproof Film Co. has invented a process by which

Films are made Waterproof and can without the Slightest Injury be washed with Soap and Water

The Waterproof Films are guaranteed not to shrink nor stretch and the process can be applied to either new or old films.

New films treated with the Waterproof process and systematically washed will keep their original first run condition as long as the sprocket holes last.

Old films (with good sprocket holes) can through our superior 19-11 system of cleaning and softening be equal to new.

We also sell a machine for washing Waterproof Films, which will wash, dry and reel up one thousand feet of Waterproof Film in eight minutes.

The National Programme

We want every exhibitor to go back to our past two Ads., cut them out and file them for reference; we want you to hold us to our promises and statements; we want you to feel a proprietary interest in the exclusive proposition that you are in fact the guardian of our franchise, that your success is founded on our franchise, and that our success is founded on your success.

We want you to force the Exchange to protect you with exclusive rights, and so protect our franchise. All of us know the temptations of this business. If we cannot force the Exchange to realize that your success and his success (and likewise our success) lay in closing his eyes to temptation, and serving you with our distinctive, exclusive programme, we will fail of our purpose.

The National Film Mfg. & Leasing Company told you they should have a hand and voice in the presentation of their programme, therefore ourselves. We mean that this programme shall prevail and that its identity shall be preserved and that the word NATIONAL shall symbolize "QUALITY" and "EXCLUSIVENESS" in the Moving Picture Trade.

Correspondence from responsible men on the Exchange proposition is invited.

"LIFE PORTRAYALS"

"A DEAD MAN'S HONOR" A Drama Tuesday, May 23rd

A young fellow saves the honor of his dead brother and his blind mother's happiness by presenting himself to the old lady as the missing son; and she passes away contented and satisfied that he has returned to comfort her last moments. It pierces every emotion and stirs up the spirit that is better for its awakening.

"TIM MAHONEY, The Scab" A Drama Friday, May 26th

Tim is a member of a labor union and joins the strike, but stands by his wife and children when it comes to a question of labor union and family union. Those who revile him alive seek to do him honor when he is dead. The most intensely impressive and the most devouringly absorbing picture ever announced.

"FIRES of FATE" A Classic Drama Saturday, May 27th

Magnificently staged, with spectacular effects that reach the paramount pinnacles of dramatic art. The most beautiful of all the beautiful Vestal Virgins loves a Roman youth, both are condemned to be burned to death; they escape the infuriated pursuers through a subterranean tunnel to life and liberty.

THE DECORATION DAY SPECIAL

is an up-to-date war story—dealing with the late unpleasantness in Cuba and telling of an affair of the heart between a young Yankee Lieutenant and a pretty senorita. The affair demonstrated that love is actually a greater force than patriotism—that if a handsome Spanish maid loves a handsome American soldier AND her country, she is sure to love the first the most, surprising as this may seem.

Released Friday, June 2

A Great Tale of the Tanbark

A CIRCUS STOWAWAY

is one gripping, powerful story of circus adventure, with enough thrills and enough human interest to send it straight to the spectators' heart. It deals with a little boy who went to see the circus and was carried away with it—ACTUALLY, not literally. When the lost lad found this to be the fact, he found, too, that it brought him troubles galore, but he was yanked out of them by a circus performer who proved one of Nature's own noblemen.

Larger Programs to Select From.

Our pet hobby of fewer and better films, bringing higher prices to the manufacturer and more money to the renter and the exhibitor, is apparently doomed. It seems that the feature film, which will stand a week's or a month's run in certain localities, will continue to be the exception and not the rule; for the trend is to spread out in quantity instead of to concentrate on quality. Several manufacturers, both independent and licensed, are making active preparations to double their output. While on the face of it this may appear as a concerted measure to hold the market in the hands of the few who are already in the field, it is, in reality, the first step to an open market. Excess of quantity begets discrimination on the part of the consumer. Quality will then govern the demand, and the "standing order" incubus will be shouldered to one side in the general scramble to obtain the product that best pleases the public.

It is a logical development of any business that the large manufacturer should increase his product. Concentration of manufacturing centers in many lines of business has not only benefited the manufacturer but has been the means of giving the public a better article for the same money. Film production is a branch of industry which is peculiarly amenable to the beneficial effects of consolidation. With years of experience to guide him, a trained organization and facilities for expansion, the established film manufacturer of today is in a position to vastly increase his output and still produce a better article than a newcomer in the field. We could cite examples to prove this statement, but they are no doubt equally well known to our readers. Really, it matters not the technical nor artistic skill nor the amount of capital available to a new entrant into this field, the difficulties against gaining only partial success are almost unsurmountable, and this without taking into consideration the close association of the business interests already established. This may sound heretical to the advocates of the open door; it may sound discouraging to the capitalist who sees in this field a good chance for investment; it may sound pessimistic or even foolish to those who think they could make pictures and better pictures than those seen on the screen today; but it is a fact nevertheless.

Theorists may argue that unlimited competition in the film manufacturing field would bring forth genius and the survival of the fittest would eliminate the unworthy. Historical facts easily discount this theory. We have only to look back over the record of other lines of business where the article dealt in has been more of a luxury than a necessity. Tracing any one of these from the experimental, through the speculative and down to the practical or final stage, we find that neither success nor perfection was reached until there was a consolidation of interests, and in some cases under unit control. So we repeat that the progress of the film-producing industry—or art, as we would prefer to call it—depends upon the efforts of those who have brought it up to its present stage rather than upon those who may now be attracted to it as a money-making opportunity.

The open door to the manufacturer is farther away than ever before, for which a long-suffering public should be grateful; but the open market is almost within reach. The exhibitors want it. Can a few manufacturers thwart the desires of over ten thousand exhibitors? We say a few manufacturers, because there are many among the twenty or more in this country who would welcome a wide-open market. They know that public opinion, if allowed its free course, would increase their sales. Why should not some manufacturers squirm under the present regime? The manufacturer who hires the best talent and provides the most expensive equipment to attain technical perfection cannot sell any more prints under the daily release standing order regime than his neighbor of parsimonious instincts who is in "the game," as he calls it, for all he can get out of it in the shortest possible time. The very absurdity and injustice of such a system presages its downfall.

Our columns have frequently given voice to the protests of the exchange man and the exhibitor against the injustice of being compelled by the exigencies of the situation to buy and exhibit films that are detrimental to their interests. With two factions, working a narrow-gauge policy on a limited program scheme, the possibility of choice of program is of course entirely or almost entirely eliminated. With an increased output from the factories that have been credited with doing good work in the past, there is now some ground for hope that the censor known as Public Opinion will have a look-in. If this business is to survive and prosper and expand, the force of public opinion must be felt at the fountain-head. It must pervade through the exhibitor, who must be allowed to select his own program to suit his audience, and it must reach up to the manufacturer through the exchange operator, who must be free to refuse such subjects as he cannot profitably handle, and that without losing his standing-order privileges.

We therefore welcome the promised increase in the weekly programs as an entering wedge in the open market, to which subject we shall revert again and on which we invite the opinions of our readers.

Temporary Victory for the Independents.

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS REVERSES ORDER OF THE LOWER COURT.

Temporary Injunctions Against Yankee Film Company and William Steiner Vacated.

Judges Coxe, Ward and Noyes, presiding in the United State Court of Appeals, handed down on May 18th an important opinion in the suits brought by the Motion Picture Patents Company against the Yankee Film Company and William Steiner. The court directed that the temporary injunctions granted by the lower court be vacated on the ground that the owners of the Edison patent 12,037 had failed for four years to file a disclaimer to claim four of the patents which had not been sustained. While this does not dismiss the bills of complaint, it places the owners of the patent in the position that unless they can convince the court that there has been no unreasonable delay in filing a disclaimer to claim 4 of the Edison patent No. 12,037, the court will declare the patent invalid. The decision means that all the preliminary injunctions granted against infringers of the Edison patent can be vacated on motion based on this opinion, and that no other motions for preliminary injunction will be granted unless complainant can show that it has good reasons for its delay in filing a disclaimer. Following is the text of the court order:

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS.
Second Circuit.

Before, Coxe, Ward and Noyes, Circuit Judges. Motion Picture Patents Company, Complainant Appellee, vs. Yankee Film Company, Defendant Appellant. Motion Picture Patents Company, Complainant-Apellee, vs. William Steiner, et al., Defendants-Appellants.

Appeals from orders of the Circuit Court, Southern District of New York.

The patent in suit (Edison reissue patent No. 12,037) has four claims. In March, 1907, it was declared valid by this court as to claim 1, 2 and 3, and invalid as to claim 4. The bill of compaint in this suit was filed in November, 1910, and the complainant has never filed a disclaimer of claim 4.

PER CURIAM:

The question presented upon these appeals is whether the complainant by its failure to enter a dis-claimer of the claim declared invalid by this court has "unnecessarily neglected and delayed" and so lost its right to maintain suits for the infringement of the other claims.

Were we certain that all the facts were before us we should consider it our duty to examine the question upon its merits for the purpose of determining whether the Circuit Court should be directed to dismiss the bills. But the complainant insists that it has not had full opportunity to present the facts and in view of this contention we shall go no further than to say that, in our opinion, the case presented is too doubtful to warrant the issuance of preliminary injunctions.

The orders of the Circuit Court are reversed with costs.

Jury Trial for Picture Men.

The showman becomes used to persecution. After some few attempts at retaliation upon the powers that be, he usually subsides within himself and tries to make the best of a bad bargain. As the showman grows older in the business, he refrains from active controversy, especially with the police. The odds are always against the showman when it comes to a question of rights. The police and lower courts are predisposed to consider him as a person of no moral standing in the community.

The showman in time ceases to be militant in defense of his rights and prefers to settle things in the "easiest way" by "handing up" or paying graft, or any one of the dozen names that are applied to the same thing—political extortion. He becomes dulled in the protection of his rights and, as time goes on, is inclined to forget them altogether, perhaps for the simple reason that he never wins. When he goes before a judge or magistrate he knows in advance that the odds are against him and prepares his defense by getting ready to pay his fine. The word of one ordinary citizen is worth a dozen of his, so he comes out of it in the usual way by paying his fine and departing without complaint.

With all the agitation and unjust prosecution against motion picture men, there are a few of them who seem to realize that they are entitled to a trial by jury. Heretofore moving picture men have been arrested for admitting some boy or girl under sixteen years without a parent or a guardian into their places. The child has seized upon the convenient excuse that it stole money to see the pictures. The exhibitor is fined under the State law for admitting the children, and usually the judge calls down a general excoriation of moving pictures which appears that evening in the newspapers together with a half-tone cut of the judge. On his part the exhibitor makes a feeble protest, pays his fine and departs. He is the goat. As a rule it never occurs to him that he has a perfect right to demand a trial by jury instead of having to bow down to the bull-dozing and self-advertising tactics of some ordinary political magistrate, who takes himself very seriously.

We have been taking note of a case exactly along this line involving an exhibitor in Albany, New York, vs. the Humane Society, who went through their usual method of attack by having him arrested and fined $100 by an arbitrary judge and sentenced to one hundred days in jail. So brow-beaten are moving picture men that there are many of them who would have accepted this decision as final and gone humbly to jail. But the Albany exhibitor, through his lawyers made an appeal and settled the case in his favor by jury.

It may seem that we have used up a great many words in arriving at the conclusion that a man is entitled to the right of a trial by jury. But there is something more to a trial by jury than the mere right of it. Under most ordinary circumstances, a jury trial is one of the fairest things in the world. The element of humanity always breaks in favor of the defendant, where magistrates, cankered by long experience, are usually severe and seldom partial to the under dog. That there are fixed juries we do not deny, but they are mostly so in cases involving matters of life and death or for great financial considerations.

Where left to a jury, the child laws and other hypercritical legislation count for little or nothing. The great masses of people from which juries are drafted are not monomaniacs on any one subject in particular; therefore, when an exhibitor is on trial for debauching the infant life of the city it is quite likely that the jury will be composed of men who send their children to moving picture theaters frequently. It is a safe estimate to say that ten out of every twelve on any jury that can be selected are friends of the moving picture; not in the abstract, but actual patrons of the photoplay theater. The majority of them, perhaps would never have known that there were any existing child laws until they were drafted on a jury, for the reason that the most of them attend picture theaters with their children, which places their children curiously out of the jurisdiction of the crime agent.

By facing a jury the exhibitor will always get more than an even break with an agitator. Any man with a strong case or a good argument is sure of his ground before a jury. If the reformers and agitators could get better results out of a jury than they now do from magistrates and police, they would long ago have used the jury. But the jury is not adaptable to their ends. Why? Well, because in a jury there is some semblance of humanity and a reasonable knowledge of child life at home. To exhibitors, we advise them to insist upon their right of trial by jury, if they have any reason to believe that they are getting the "double cross."

The Three-line "Squib."

For some time past we have looked upon our esteemed namesake and contemporary, "The New York World," as a barometer of moving pictures. The least disturbance in the field of moving pictures is recorded in its columns with the celerity of a seismograph, the same as earthquakes are recorded in different parts of the world. Heretofore the "New York World" has been the open and avowed enemy of the moving picture. At the slightest touch upon their seismograph, its editors burst into a roar if it be anything pertaining to the moving picture, and they have roared many times. At times their seismograph is out of order, because it has magnified beyond proportions very small disturbances. Any variation between the real happening and the newspaper record of it may be set down as "journalism." In other words journalism is the difference between fact and fiction; between the time of occurrence and its appearance on the printed page.

It has been interesting to us to watch the slow death grapple that has been going on between the "New York World" and the moving picture. Little by little we note that the moving picture is bringing the mighty "World" to its knees. It is a duel to the death between two great mediums of publicity: the newspaper and the moving picture. The newspaper, of which the "World" is only here cited as one example, has done its best, or rather its worst, to drive the moving picture out. The newspaper has been put to the test; it has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. With all the power of the press throughout this land, united in their utmost efforts to damn the moving pictures, aided and abetted by every crank, reformer, monomaniac and self-advertising gospel sharp, the picture has gone steadily onward, increasing in power and prestige. All its enemies combined have not availed to check its onward march, and the press of the country is beginning to realize that for once it has met its master.

It is amusing to us pygmies, who have watched this process of tying Gulliver, to note his occasional shortness of breath. Every concession that the daily press makes to the moving picture, leaves their argument against it that much weaker. In the body of their long-winded denunciations, the press has in most cases qualified them with a few lines in an obscure corner, setting forth some possible small meed of good to be derived from the moving picture. The press has sown seeds like that from time to time, never supposing that the same would take root in the minds of their readers. The truth is mighty, and it will prevail as it has prevailed. A three-line "squib" with truth in it seems to live longer than a three column scare-head which contains a lie.

It happens, this bright sunny morning in May, that our eye falls upon a three line editorial "squib" in the "New York World," which reads as follows:

> "Motion pictures to teach geography in the public schools, as Thomas A. Edison suggests, would doubtless REDUCE TRUANCY TO A MINIMUM."

There also lies before us on the desk, a large bundle of clippings from the "New York World," which we have been saving for many months. We knew that at some time they would come in handy, and we are going to keep them longer yet. But just as a matter of contrast to the three-line editorial "squib" above, which suggests the once despised picture as a cure for truancy, let us read you a few of the scare-heads covering some two and three column write-ups in the "New York World," which might prove interesting by comparison: "Backs World's Fight on Moving Picture Evil," Mar. 27, 1911; "Crime Is Exalted before Youth in Moving Pictures," Sept. 26, 1910; "Censors Admit They O.K. Picture in Bad Taste," Sept. 27, 1910; "Nations Awake to Evils Found in Moving Pictures," Sept. 29, 1910; "Youth-Corrupting Films Driven Out of Picture Shows," Sept. 28, 1911; "'Guilty,' Is Plea of Boy Made a Thief by Picture Films," Sept. 30, 1910; "Boys See Pictures of Sufferings of Morphine Fiend," Oct. 1, 1910; "Motion Pictures Are Denounced by Jurists," Oct. 4, 1910; "Amateur Bandits Copying Picture Hold-Up, Stab Boy," Oct. 11, 1910.

The above are taken from one of the "World's" periodical "crusades," but finally, perhaps growing breathless and weary in their pursuit of an invisible chimera, the "World" shows a sign of weakening in an editorial of last October 28th, directly in the midst of its great "St. George and the Dragon" act, which says: "Is it not a strange comment upon the slowness of the civilized community to make use of a wonderful invention that all the best possibilities of motion pictures to debauch youth are promptly seized upon, and while we have scarcely begun to realize their potent value for education and for clean amusement?" Thus do we see that in the midst of their charge the World shows a wee white feather. The weak spot has been exposed at all times and we have always been able to see it.

We have continued to watch the death agony of the New York World in its defeat by the moving picture. We expect before long to see more editorial "squibs" in that mighty journal in praise of the picture. And we shall hope to see these "squibs" enlarged until the day of atonement shall have come, when the New York World along with a few thousand of its kind, shall have written a line of praise for every line in which they have anathematized the moving picture. It is not beyond our wildest dreams to expect, before many months have rolled by, to see two and three-column boosts of the photoplay where once that space was devoted to its destruction.

Free Theater in Red Oak, Iowa.

Something new in the way of moving picture exhibition recently transpired in Red Oak, Iowa, that of a regular moving picture show in a theater seating 800, which is utilized by the young men of the Congregational church for a regular Sunday night exhibition. They have rented the town hall for the purpose, which is well stated in the following extract from their printed circular:

"The young men of the Congregational Church of Red Oak have planned a series of Sunday evening meetings for men, women and children who do not care to attend a formal church service Sunday evening. These meetings are not revival meetings, nor are they intended to draw from other churches. They will be social, informal and interesting."

We have received a letter from the operator, Mr. L. C. Wallace, which gives us an outline of their unique project. They started the first Sunday night with the first reel of the Life of Moses, and on succeeding Sundays will show one of the reels of the Moses series until they have been completed. There will also be a number of reels of educational and travel stories. The music will consist of a male quartette, accompanied by an orchestra composed of the young men of the church. None of the young men who are active in the management of the hall are connected in any way with the moving picture business. Their object is an unselfish desire to do some good work in their city. Their plan does not interfere with any professional moving picture theater, as such entertainments are not permitted there on Sundays. But in all ways it is conducted exactly as a regulation picture house on a week day, and the reasonable admission price will no doubt insure crowded houses from the beginning.

The Actor and the Photo Play.

By Robert Grau

During the past week I took it upon myself to visit three different studios in the vicinity of New York where the photoplay is in the process of creation, and I was wholly amazed, as a result of my observations, at the manner in which these film companies have applied themselves to the art of producing, and confess that they have embraced a distinctly theatrical line of endeavor with an ingenuity, not to say practicability, that is astonishing.

The first conclusion I arrived at was that the photographic phase of the productions evolved is the one by which the greatest results are achieved, and the producer grasps this fact with a resort to stagecraft amounting to positive genius. Imagination plays perhaps the largest part in the constructive side of these photoplays, and we will not want for constant novelties as long as the methods to impress the spectator are on the high plane they were when revealed to me.

Of course, in this country the photoplay has not yet reached the stage where the greatest writers and players combine to enhance the pictorial offering, but we know that this is to come, for if Paris witnesses the spectacle of Rostand, Capus and Hervieu writing plays for the picture theater, we will not wait long before Augustus Thomas, Paul Armstrong ad Charles Klein follow in their footsteps here.

The fundamental principles under which the photoplay is to reach an exalted state, are of a character indicating both stability and perpetuity; only the manner of presentation can be bettered, and this is striven for with an energy and persistency wholly lacking in the conduct of the theater as heretofore observed by the writer hereof.

The spectacle of well-known actors, men and women whose names are known all over the country, parading the streets with "make-up" on their faces and attired in costume, on their way to an outdoor scene, was surely a novel one. Yet the enthusiasm of these people was as great as it must also be contagious.

The producer of "Powers' Picture Plays" happens to be a literal namesake of the president of the company, so that I was greatly surprised to find myself confronted with Francis A. Powers, a playwright and producer of established reputation. Here we have evidence that the best is none too good for the film companies. Mr. Powers is the author of one of the greatest plays produced in the last generation. Charles Frohman brought him to New York to stage his play "The First Born," and Mr. Powers has ever since been in demand both as actor and producer. If such as he are sought for, then the day is not so distant when the calibre of plays and players now available in Paris will be duplicated in this country and perhaps even surpassed.

At another studio I found all of the appointments of a first-class theater visible at every turn. The "stock company" had assembled, and in its entirety represented an organization such as would grace the stage of a Broadway theater for the reading of a play by Mr. Belasco. Moreover, the ladies and gentlemen were provided with many requisites for their necessarily monotonous labors that might well be emulated in the Long Acre district; in fact it is a long time since I have been privileged to witness a more ingratiating assembly with an utter absence of discord.

Undoubtedly a master mind has brought into this new calling methods of procedure which have for their basis the idea that an actor made comfortable will give a better response to what is required of him than one who is wholly ignored in this respect, for certain it is that in a seance lasting two hours, I found more evidence of consideration, more politeness and less ostentation than I have ever seen accorded to a body of players in my forty years' observation under similar conditions. Can we wonder then that the uplift in this field goes on everlastingly, and that each year the idea becomes more general that an entourage may be undertaken with grace and dignity by a higher grade of participants than those who have gone before?

Only yesterday a distinguished player, one whose career has been without a blemish, accosted me on upper Broadway. He said to me:

"I want to ask your advice. I have had an offer from the ——— Company for the summer. I need the money badly, but I am afraid it will injure me in the fall when I seek to go back to my regular vocation. What do you advise?"

I asked this venerable actor if he had as yet closed for the coming season with any company, and when informed that he had not, I asked if he would like to go with me to see a rehearsal of a photoplay in order that he might better be enabled to decide for himself, though I had about decided to advise him to accept the splendid offer. He was quick to accept my invitation, and if this article should meet the eyes of the photoplayers whom he saw rehearse, they will not need me to tell them how surprised and delighted he was.

The next day this man, one of the patriarchs of the stage, presented himself at the business offices of one of the larger film corporations. I did not go with him, but here is an extract from his letter to me two days later:

"I have to thank you for your good offices again, for I fear I can never be grateful enough to you for the service you have rendered. I have accepted the engagement, and was somewhat surprised to find that these people actually seemed to have some regard for my comfort. I had no commission to pay to any agent, and this was in itself a revelation; but when I was asked if I needed any advance of salary, really I wanted to pinch myself to make sure that it was not a dream. There is nothing I would like so much as to remain in New York all the year around, and I am wondering if this may not be my lot as a result of your discernment."

I had always had the conviction that the greatest successes in the amusement calling have been made by men who came from other fields, but who brought with them the qualities of humanity and courtesy, both of which seem to be possessed by those who have made fame and fortune in the moving picture field.

FLICKERS.

There seems to be a doubt in the minds of the clergy as to whether they should loudly denounce the moving picture as an agency of the devil, or whether to install an outfit and boom things in the church.

A lady speaker in Leominster, Mass., drew great applause when she classed "cheap moving picture shows as amongst the worst rubbish of civilization." In other words, cheapness is a crime. We should like to have a moving picture of the lady getting her money's worth on bargain day.

The ruling in Brockton, Mass., is that a picture theater can have only one singer; no duets will be permitted. Somebody must suffer for this—will it be the manager or the public?

The Rev. Mr. Bliss, of Montclair, is one of the applicants denied a moving picture license in that comatose town. Bliss tried to relieve their ignorance on picture matters. Where ignorance is folly, is it wise to be Bliss?

Half-Baked Picture Plays.

Successes and Failures of the Week.

C. H. Claudy.

With the rush and roar of the demand for a stated number of releases weekly, it is small wonder that the standard of production often suffers—yet there are producers whose ability, brains, staff and accessories are of so high an order that their failures, when made, are from lack of proper material to work up into a play, and not from lack of attention to detail or of inability to "set" a fine scene in a reasonable story.

"The Railroad Builder," by Thanhouser, is a case in point. The action is hung around one central scene—that of an incendiary fire of piles of ties and material for building a railroad. And that scene is so good, so well planned, executed and finished, that it is a thousand pities the same attention was not devoted to the story and the rest of the details.

The preliminary work necessary to get up this fire scene must have been huge. It includes a real fire—albeit much of it must have been oil—a real fire engine at work, and a most realistic coloring of the finished film in red dye. Rarely, if ever, has a finer representation been made of the terrible majesty of a great conflagration than this, and all the credit which can be accorded the producer must go to him from those who saw this piece of work.

But the rest of the material was very ordinary, the story weak to the point of foolishness, and the action at times so unreal that the audience laughed.

To specify, the story is that of a girl and her father, who are to give up their little home because the railroad is coming across their property. Very true, very sad, but inevitable. That the girl and her friends object is also natural, but that they should be so terrorized at the result of condemnation proceedings, necessary to give a railroad right of way across land, or that the coming of the railroad across the land is such a tragedy as to need a crime to stop it, is not natural, and the audience sees it at once. However, admitting that it is possible that farmer friends of the girl and her father would seek to destroy the preliminary work by fire to prevent the railroad crossing the land, isn't it foolish to show a huge piece of construction work, with a gang of about a dozen men in charge of the foreman, who is also the construction engineer, and insist to the audience that these men—this handful—was all that was at work on the railway? For they all go off to lunch together, and no one at all sees the incendiaries at work. And what sort of an incendiary is it that lights a torch before he gets to his pile of lumber?

Perhaps the weakest part of this scene is in the preliminary, in which the handful of track layers are at work, a man in the immediate foreground wielding a pick on the stone roadbed of already laid track so tenderly as not to disturb a single stone! Almost as bad was the gang of farmers, who first attempt to tear up the railroad with pitchforks and spades and after striking two or three obviously ineffectual blows, decide to fire the lumber piles.

We know that those workmen were not working, because —they were not working. They were obviously playing at working, and very poorly at that. We know this is real track, because we see it, but we know it was hired for the occasion, because every one is so careful of it, with his tools. We know this isn't a real gang of workmen or a real construction engineer, because they neither look the part nor act it, because there are not enough of them, and because construction engineers, who accept huge contracts, don't boss a gang of twelve nor eat with them in security half a mile from the work. We know, anyway, that it isn't a real railroad or a real piece of work, because we have seen some smears on a piece of paper which the president of the road showed the "construction engineer" as "the plans," and we have learned from the sub title that this is where the construction engineer is given the work, and we know railroad contracts are not let in that way, or from single sheets of rough plans, in a minute and a half!

Well, to get on with the action: the farmers fire the lumber piles, the railroad builders are warned, the construction engineer is captured and bound to a tree, and the girl, having a change of heart, gallops off for a fire engine. The engine arrives, shortly—fire still burning briskly and in spite of the fact that it is, on the screen, so great a fire as to defy all attempts, one engine puts it out in a short while! And finally, we have a scene labeled "Next Morning," showing a small fire still burning in a lumber pile—must have been careless firemen. And when girl and construction engineer agree to get married, of course neither papa nor girl give a rap that the road crosses their land, any more!

Weak story and lack of attention to details so that any one can see the unreality of the action, all to lead up to a magnificent and truly remarkable fire picture, which, set in a more probable story and one with the same care given details as was given the fire itself, and the maker would have made a release which would have been the talk of the town.

And one more rap, right here. I have lived with different kinds of American and foreign workmen. I have trailed it in Alaska, been on surveying parties and traveled considerably. And I have never seen a bunch of American workmen who would abuse, be rude to, and flagrantly insult a woman in distress, as this construction gang does when the daughter impotently orders them from her land. As a nation we are decent to women—while we would, as track layers, pay little heed to a feminine protest, we would not, in real life, jeer, sneer, laugh and conduct ourselves as hoodlums because a girl—and a pretty girl at that—told us this was her land and we couldn't use it. Even the foreman-construction engineer, who later, supposedly, wedded her, laughed. Does it do any good to fail of truth to the extent of maligning even plain working men?

It is with some reluctance that I now mention Selig's "Back to the Primitive" under this title, for in many ways this is a great film, greatly done.

As I saw it, memories of all the cast-away-on-a-desert-island books I had ever read came crowding to the fore, beginning with Charles Reade's "Foul Play." Only "Foul Play" is a logical, well developed story and "Back to the Primitive" is confused with unnecessary plot; and valuable film space, which might so easily have been filled with thrilling incident, filled with all too ordinary drama.

The story of the film from the maker's standpoint is this—A man, in Australia, sends for girl (sister) to come to him. Girl, on boat, meets Lord Somebody-or-other, also an American mining engineer. Both fall in love with her. All cast-away. Lord Something-or-other, not much of a man, gets in trouble with mining engineer, finally eaten by lions. Clear field for mining engineer. After several years on cast-away spot, rescued by party and reunited to brother who sent for her.

Whether Selig did this in Australia or Africa or the wilds of Lake Michigan, I don't know, but the photography was bully, the scenery bullier and the lion scenes bulliest of all and well done, finely done. There wasn't a person in the audience that saw that film when I saw it who wasn't on tip-toe. The lion scene when the man and girl are hunted by them was great and the lion killing scene when they waste a perfectly good lion for the sake of picturing the shooting, was beautifully done. In fact, the whole thing, as far as it went was new, good, well conceived, well executed, and one wants to fire praise wholesale at Selig for doing it. But, with such a tremendous lot of material at hand, why tie up a lot of film with the sickening for the girl, with scenes on the deck of the liner, with the mining engineer slapping the lords face, with the quarrel, etc. Why have the second man a dramatic part at all? His real function is to get eaten. Just think of all that might have been put in that film—of the hunt for water, the making of the first fire, the attempt to signal a passing liner and the horrible, sickening disappointment when the signal fated—ei storm and hunger and thirst would might have been pictured—of the first bow and arrow and learning the use of it, of a rescue of the girl by the man from a poisonous snake (see Charles Reade's story) and the use of the obvious drama tacked on to this film by the producer.

I quarrel, not with the good part of the film, but that there wasn't more of it. As it is, it is a fine thing, but had the interest been sustained, and been wholly about the island home and the mind been distracted with lettuce and birds and spades and it would have been better. As it is, much under this heading as half-baked as any I can recall (which is only that of one week) only from its normal setting, from the rare splash picture details were worked out and from the spectacular magnificent of the flame and the lion hunt, this film deserves—and here gets—more praise than censure.

Some one told me Kalem's "The Carnival" was worth seeing. And it is, but it is more as example of what heart interest and a realistic actor and actress can do to carry a play, than what scenery and production can do to make it. The story, of a husband who leaves his wife, carrying off the baby, because she is too frivolous, and who is so unhappy in his artist's life as she is in her gay one, is simple enough. Having the two meet at a masked ball through the kindly offices of a mutual friend, is obvious enough. But the play, with a merely average plot, and hardly anything in scenery or costume to be interesting—the "scene of revelry" to which the wife goes from her home looking exactly as if it might be the dining room of a second class boarding house—the play carries over because of the convincing way the woman acts her part, and the man too, for that matter, after he gets over his most hysterical histrionics, in which he is rather too vehement it seems to me, even for a Frenchman. That cunning baby is a hit, of course, and the mother's face and her actions when she finds the baby gone, when she remarks herself to her husband and when she pleads for him to take her back were real and human. Two women seated near me both wiped their eyes as the man took the penitent girl and his baby in his arms. When any pathetically intended scene makes people in an audience wipe their eyes, then there is nothing to do but write "success" after it, even if, as in this case, the story proceeded in a setting but half baked, and if, as is certainly true, it could have been made the stronger and more convincing by a little less strenuosity on the husband's part, a little more reality on the part of the producer in his scenes of gaiety and revelry.

A recent sarcastic article in a magazine spoke of the limitations of the motion picture play, and referred particularly to night scenes. "The characters carry lanterns," the writer said, "to show that it is night."

In that one sentence is an arraignment of all producers in general who commit this sin against common sense and good taste, and the Edison producing management in particular. The "Haunted Tower" had full daylight for midnight, the "Struggle on the Cliff" has a blue dye for moonlight which isn't deep enough, but which at least lets you "pretend." Then the girls, who go to rescue the man over the cliff, climb at top speed, carrying an unlighted lantern which throws no visible light and by the aid of which they are able to see away down the cliff to the clinging man. Whereupon they get excited and cast the lantern away from them in the bushes, but they can still see perfectly well! But when they flee to get to the bottom, whence they have lowered him, the last girl remembers the lantern and picks it up (still burning, presumably) so they can see their way down again. And they bring him home in a moonlight so bright one wonders why there was a lantern anyway! When you intrude the mechanism of production, Mr. Producer, you spoil the illusion. Much, much better, no lantern when you have a moonlight bright enough to see by—but if you must have a lantern, then put a light in it, and juggle the film, even if it is troublesome, so that the lantern appears to give light.

For so, and only so, will such a film escape being called half baked—not only by the present scribe, which would be a small matter—but by the public at large, which is quicker and quicker to see and resent the careless work in production and keener and keener on first class work, where the details are attended to as lovingly as the massed effects.

Illustrated Song Slides.

We hear from time to time considerable about the "personality" of the moving picture actor and actress, and how they affect the audiences, etc. What about the personality of the illustrated-song singers? We think that this is as important as the other, if for no other reason than that the singers are seen in the flesh by the audiences. Not long ago, The World's New England representative visited a moving picture house—to watch the illustrated songs in particular, rather than the pictures, as we usually do. Careful observation on this visit showed that considerably more than one-half of this particular audience was looking at the singer most of the time. They were trying, as we saw it, to do two things at once—watch the singer and the slides simultaneously. The same thing was in evidence at several other houses visited for this purpose. Therefore, it is necessary for managers of moving picture theaters to secure as their singers people of attractive physical appearance. It is also very desirable to obtain singers whose tonal qualities and whose delivery and enunciation is just a little bit out of the ordinary run. The audiences like this, as it interests them. For want of a better word, we call these qualities "personality." We feel justified in stating that, in our experience, at least, singers of attractive physical looks receive better encouragement from the audiences than those not favored so well in appearance. This being the case, the moving picture managers must try to gratify the desire of their audiences in this respect. We also feel that it is a distinct advantage to a moving picture theater to see to it that their singers, if female, dress wholly in white; if male, in blue or black. People seem to enjoy themselves more when the performance is "dressed up" just a little bit. Some M. P. theaters have made it a regular policy to have all their illustrated singers dressed in this way, as it lends a uniform and ship-shape appearance to the whole performance. Attention to these smaller details is of at least as great importance in this business as in any other. The moving picture is far and away the most important part of the show, but the illustrated song and singer must have careful attention. Our observations have been that some houses rather let this end of it slip by in their zeal to give the pictures all their time.

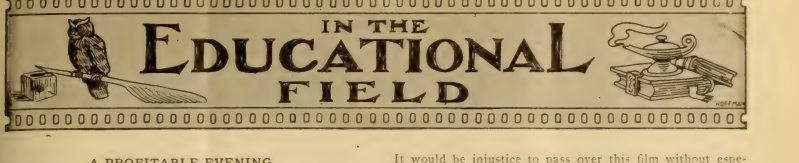
STARS MAY COME AND STARS MAY GO, BUT THESE GO ON FOR EVER.—(From Judge.)



A PROFITABLE EVENING.

Visiting a picture house in Brooklyn recently where the choice of films is always a worthy one, the following were most acceptable and worthy of recognition in this column: "Statues in New York," a descriptive film, interesting and instructive. People who may be acquainted with the original of these views enjoy seeing them in picture, while others appreciate the opportunity of seeing those things with which they are distantly acquainted only, and are glad of the occasion of a "close range" view. In other parts of the country, and especially among school children, this film of New York's statues and monuments cannot but be of acceptable interest.

On the same film, Pathes show "The Chief's Talisman." (Why a whole film cannot be given to the New York scenes is a timely question.) The "Talisman" is an Indian picture in a new and acceptable form, blending a true religious thought with early Indian life, associated with the life of a preacher and his family. An Indian chief, having been befriended by the preacher, comes under his benign influence and plants the "cross" in his camp as a sign of his belief. The old chief dying, his successor destroys the cross and arouses his followers to lawlessness and pillage. One of the places first attacked is the home of the preacher, who takes his family to a place of shelter, where hangs a picture of the old chief. When the attacking Indians invade this room, the preacher meets them with an uplifted cross, while an apparition of the old chief appears as issuing from the picture. As a result, the Indians, cowed and awestricken, make their departure. The cross, "The Chief's Talisman," proves the salvation of the lives of the preacher and his family, even as it had the former chief.

Another good picture with a strong moral lesson is "The Children of Social Favorites" (Vitagraph). A more explicit title would be "Children of Society Habitues." There is nothing to show that the parents were "social favorites," while there was everything to suggest that they were "society functionists" mad. The mother exhibits an uncontrollable impatience to attend a "function." Her husband's delayed return from business irritates her to the extent that she cannot tarry even long enough to bid her own children "good-night," such is her haste to be going. After being put to bed, the children see from their room into a neighboring house where a sick child is receiving tenderest parental care and sympathy. Comparing their own loveless condition with what they see, these neglected young ones concoct a plan of feigned sickness, hoping thereby to win the wickedly withheld parental care. Their nurse, alarmed by the condition into which these young actors throw themselves in response to the parents, who with strange indifference tell the nurse to "telephone for the doctor," plainly showing that their love for social prestige is of more importance than the care of their children. The doctor is called and sends a peremptory letter to the parents calling them home, which they reluctantly obey. Of course there is an assumed parental interest, but not sufficient to satisfy the hunger of the little people, who continue in their pretended illness, making the calling of a "specialist" necessary. In consultation, the two doctors are not long in discovering the deception. With the parents out of the room, the children confess to the doctors, who readily accept the situation and see the motive of the young people. Upon leaving with the parents, the doctors plainly declare to them that these children are suffering from "lack of parental love," and add such pertinent advice that before long the children are the happy recipients of the parental affection due them, and a different home is theirs. The lesson is an exceedingly profitable one, with an interpretation valuable alike to rich and poor. It is at once a rebuke to careless parental indifference, with a plea for dutiful love to children which lies an educational and refining value.

It would be injustice to pass over this film without especially mentioning the acting of the young children—boy and girl—they are well known to "Vitagraph's" friends, but in no other picture do they appear to such advantage as in this one. An evening with such pictures as these is extremely interesting.

A contemporary magazine suggests that a motion picture machine should be "as much a part of a church furnishing as an organ," proceeding to suggest that such pictures as "Herod and the New Born King" make acceptable "Sunday school pictures." True! On this page this subject has been often and sufficiently presented, and it is good to see others taking up the same line of thought. The writer of these lines has proved, however, that there is more theory than practice in this ambitious plan at this period of time.

Until there are more pictures like "Herod," with the certainty of their fidelity to the original conception, the time is not as close at hand as the writer could wish. Would that other—many other—magazines might take up the same desires.

NEW AND PROGRESSIVE FILMS.

Pathe Freres have forthcoming another film series of educational value, besides being distinctly interesting and entertaining. The first one, entitled "Bob's Microscope," is made attractive from the fact that science is presented as interesting to a boy. "Bob" is the son of a professor, who supplies him with a microscope and shows him how to use it. The working of yeast in a drop of ale, the insects in pond life in certain cheese, enlarged until they appear like lobsters and crabs, make Bob shudder to think of what he may have eaten; even as others will when they see them on the screen. Of especial interest is the perpetual action going on in growing seaweed; and the flow of blood in a tadpole's tail, an action never before pictured, consequently not exhibited; making these productions of increasing interest. The development of life in decaying vinegar and the action of salt to water are produced in such wise as to make the former look like an eel pond and the latter to appear as mountains in motion.

The series following Pathe's water scenes will prove very acceptable. If exhibitors will only give them just publicity, they will not only be educating the mind of the people who see them but elevating the taste of their patrons, thereby justifying the worthy efforts of makers of these films and creating a demand for more of a similar educational kind.

Another Pathe film is one of a natural history order and is applied only in illustrate the making of a cocoon, beginning with the picture of the professional naturalist, illustrating the method of catching one of the various varieties of the larger kind of extraordinary insects. A continuous picture shows the entire nature and special peculiarities of scorpion life. Its progress of attack over darkness is followed by a conflict with a worm, in which the scorpion is victor. Such a film as this will probably be more interesting who sees it, by, without doubt, the fine and scientific of the class of insects and animals here presented, may possess in a way new and valuable information to stimulate the interest who see Pathe Freres go to the trouble and expense of producing and introducing a series which must add to receive the highest commendation of those who are truly interested. Communication is even without [illegible] —this encouragement should be of such substantial nature as to warrant a continuance of the production of this class of film.

The film that amuses may probably be passed on a popular basis; the film that amuses and instructs is sure to be looked for a second time; the film that amuses, instructs and elevates will be a seed for times without number.

The Star Theatre, Boston.

By Henry.

This house is one of the finest throughout New England, built especially for the exploitation of the photoplay. One of the very first to be built in Boston, the Star embodies several features which have not been surpassed in later moving picture houses, and has been copied by several New England houses up to date.

The Star was started August 1, 1907, and was completed and ready for the public by November 1, 1907. It has a frontage of thirty-two feet, and a gross depth of nearly one hundred and twenty feet. The architecture of the house is unique, and calculated to catch and hold the attention of the passer by as can readily be understood from the photographs. The interior arch and dome, which necessitated the removal of the front section of the second story, are points well worth the attention of any intending exhibitor. The fresco work is also distinctly out of the usual run. An attractive shade of green is the general color scheme of the front, with large quantities of gold leaf setting out the especially attractive features. The dome, which is of unusual size, is a mass of electric lights, with all the remaining space between the bulbs dotted with pure gold leaf. The two rows of tiling, which can be easily seen from the photographs, are unusually attractive and form the receptacle for two lines of electric lights. The total number of electric bulbs on the outside of the Star amounts to the imposing total of twenty four hundred and ninety-three (2493), which range from eight (8) to sixty-four (64) candle power.

Artistic signs, etc., are carefully placed here and there, about the lobby. Care, however, is always exercised by the Star that too many signs may not detract from the general beauty of the lobby. These easels, which were copied by many of the photoplay houses in Massachusetts, are of interest, as they add tremendously to the general good appearance of the lobby. They were measured and made of brass expressly for the purpose by an expert sign maker, and give the lobby a uniformity of appearance, often lacking in photoplay lobbies.

The electric signs of the Star are among the most salient features of the house. The monster arched sign reading "Admission, 10c. All Seats Free," is an electrical achievement. The photograph gives an idea of the immense size of this jumbo sign. The sign was designedly made large, as the Star is directly at the head of Hanover Street, one of the city's main arteries, and can be seen the entire length of the street. The sign reading, "The Star Theater," is also a monster. The symbolic star-shaped sign, high up on the front, is illuminated with sixty-four (64) candle power lights of a dark wine color, giving a relief from the yellow shade of the ordinary lights used on the lobby. Along the sides of the house are two large electric signs projecting outward, which read, "S-T-A-R" running vertically. The huge star, seen in the photograph, was a very clever idea of some one, as it revolves day and night, with electric lights everywhere upon it.

The Star is the best fitted house in New England in electrical display, not barring any legitimate theater. The figures in the lobby were made after designs originated by the president of the Star Amusement Company.

Exits are strongly favorable points for the Star. The three doors shown by the photographs are all wide exits, while the one to the right is also the regular means of entrance. The middle door is also used as an advertising medium, and is a work of art, made of mahogany with gold and inlaid handwork.

The admission fee is a flat rate of 10 cents, at any time of the day, with no "rain-checks" of any sort. Four hundred and fifty-three (453) is the seating capacity, with a single aisle.

The operating room is the best in Boston, according to the city inspectors, having a large ventilating shaft for cool air. The operating booth is filled with all the newest devices, aiming at speed and accuracy of operation, and includes two Powers Cameragraph No. 6 machines, and a stereopticon. The throw from the booth to the stage is one hundred and four (104) feet.

A twelve-foot motor drives an electric fan in the cellar, which pumps the foul, impure air from the auditorium instantly. Another large motor, above the body of the house, in the general executive offices of the corporation, forces pure, cool air into the auditorium. The Star has no use for electric fans, even in the hottest weather, and this statement can hardly be made for any considerable number of New England theaters.

Long before it was thought possible to show a "perfect" picture in a house anything but dark; the Star was exhibiting its reels in an auditorium in which the print of this page could be easily read. The long cornice which flanks the auditorium on the two sides, hides numerous electric bulbs. By this means the house is well lighted; but the glare of the light is hidden by the cornice.

The photograph of the interior speaks for itself; the imported torches, the general paneling, the architecture in toto, can be seen better by the picture than by wordled descriptions. Red, green and gold are the interior colors. The house has twenty-six employees, running from a general manager and a house manager, to porters and ushers. Four reels of absolute first choice of Licensed pictures, and four acts of vaudeville comprise an excellent bill. The house projects what many in the trade consider to be the best pictures in New England.

A neat, clean house, courteous, uniformed ushers, with an excellent show and management make the Star's success. General Manager George J. Appleby is entitled to recognition for his able and efficient handling of the house; aided by his able assistant, Mr. Charles Cherry. As can be seen the Star is certainly a house de luxe; and this, with its unusually high-class methods in selecting pictures and freedom from any objectionable lobby advertisements and its general tendency to uplift the photoplay in the estimation of the public, earn for the Star Theater of Boston, the commendation and approval of all.

The Civilizing Value of the Photoplay

H. C. Judson.

It was Poe's opinion that, leaving out the making of lyric poetry, poems had a better chance of expressing itself in prose, a short story than in any other form of literary art. Perhaps if he had lived in our days he would have modified that opinion, and included photoplays.

Through long centuries the short story has reached a perfection that is astonishing. The photoplay is very new; it would not be fair to set our best moving picture on equal terms beside our best short story. One has a faculty of psychological analysis at present denied to the other. There still seem to be both mechanical and artistic difficulties in the way of moving pictures due wholly to lack of experience. But the pictures offer a fine chance for artistic expression.

Man uses art as he uses everything else, not excluding religion, for barter and bribe. But, though it was religion that lifted him to walk upright upon the earth, art is a staff in his hand and helps him to maintain his position. Science can prove no man to be a beast to learn, but the same man can hardly escape from art. Art builds up human qualities for its pictures and interprets them to us. When you get down to rock bottom, art belongs to the race just as religion does. Perhaps the differences between them is no more than between the profiles of the same face. It was the spirit breathed into man that makes him different from the beasts. True art expresses the spirit and awakens the spirit in those who hear. It gives a new for human things as different from beastlike things, and this makes for civilization. Yet there are some who, for the sake of civilization blindly deny the people the means of acquiring taste.

People who have taste have a right to demand of artists that, as far as possible, they remain true to their own humanity and give, as well as they can, only what is truly human. Their work must give pleasure; it must reach into the human experience behind its auditors and waken the most joyous memories that are hidden there. Everything we see or hear reaches back into our memory, but art selects the elements—they must be joys—that it desires to awaken. Each memory that awakens is very faint. We cannot separate the thousand past joys that add together to make our pleasure in one beautiful spring morning; for the memories come from the whole man; the lowest kinds of physical pleasures unite with the highest spiritual joys to make its beauty. Still, the quality in life that is most important to us and gives us most delight is our humanity itself, the spirit that makes us different from the beasts. Nothing stirs us like the sight of human victory. Any thing but victory in our art would disgust us. Behind every great tragedy, even the most harrowing, is the light of this human victory.

A recent release, "Aida," (Edison) a photoplay taken from the tragic opera, is a perfect illustration of this. Aida, the Ethiopian princess, a captive and the slave of Amneris, the Egyptian princess Radames, the Egyptian general whom both love, but who loves only Aida, conquers the Ethiopians and captures Aida's father. On account of this victory he is honored with the hand of the Egyptian princess; but he still loves Aida and mournfully reveals to her a secret affecting their people. Amneris and the high priest overhear the conversation, and Radames is condemned to be entombed alive. Aida, when none is looking, slips into the tomb, and he finds her as the great stone is lowered and darkness comes. Amneris, who could have saved him, but didn't, dies hopelessly mourning at the door of the tomb. The observer of this tragedy feels that all three are guilty, but four of them make atonement by death in the midst of a solemn happiness, while Amneris, in great sorrow is relieved by death. None was favored by fate, but all three pass out into the mystery, and the heart feels that each, by his or her humanity, achieved a safe harbor from the struggle. It is a simple expedient, having Aida voluntarily enter the tomb, but it shows a quality in man's spirit that robs tragedy of its sting, not one whit less for Amneris than for Aida, herself, or Radames, and not one whit the less for you and me. This reaches a high peak of human grandeur, though not the highest.

We cannot do without such pictures that show the soul obtaining victory through the mystery of life; but we prefer most pictures to show happiness obtained through victory over such trials as we ourselves meet again and again; we like a happy ending. They are easier to understand. No matter what is striven for, if the struggle is plainly shown and the end a truly human victory, has not been obtained at the expense of our common humanity, the picture will not only please but also uplift. It isn't always admitted, but it is none the less the truth.

Such a picture as "Where the Shamrock Grows," released in March by the Rex Company, is a civilizing force. It is simply a love story, nothing else. It no more teaches anything than a rose does, but it is human. The horse of Nora Shannon, of the Hall, runs away and is caught by the manly young blacksmith. This incident is convenient to introduce the man, with whom Nora happens to fall in love, and also to show that he is worthy. The probable reason for the play is to picture the scene where Nora makes love to him in the blacksmith shop beside the smoky forge and surrounded by the humble implements of his trade. The value of this scene lies in the human way she does it; is largely in the acting (the part is taken by Ann Wilson). Instead of being bowered by her surroundings Nora makes the smithy as fit a place as the withdrawing room of a royal palace, and, in return, the smith (Philip Smalley) in his human dignity forgets his apron and the forge to play the man. In such a picture there is good human company and one will find no corruption of good manners in it.

Another picture that stands out distinctly is the Nestor film, "The Bridal Trail." This, too, is as simply a love story as the last, and it is also one in which the human characterization as shown in the acting of the heroine, Gilda (Alexandra Phillips), and of her father, Ben Darwin (Charles Kline), are of more importance than the excitement of the story of the lovers struggling against difficulties. Such pictures as this have the same humanizing effect as good literature, for the cultivation of which men like Carnegie are willing to spend millions.

Beauty of background is not lacking in many of the pictures, but the background of "The Bridal Trail" is exceptionally fine. Beauty is of great importance in drama, which pictures a human struggle and victory, for it is itself a witness to victory. It is distinctly human and not given to the beasts. Yet, like the climax of a drama, it is the reward of struggle, and it should never be intruded into any scene.

One of the strongest pictures (barring a few unfortunate elements) among recent releases was "The Mother" (Selig) in this picture two human souls might conditions unrelieved by any suggestion of beauty; and in that fact is its strength. We see an innocent man condemned to be hanged, accepting his fate and marching to the gallows. His face shows that he feels it just as we would; but he walks in dignity and is unrushed. We see too much have seen, if the choice of an actress for this part had been more fortunate) the man's mother struggling in her soul against the inevitable. The purpose of this picture was to show these two facts; yet other elements were introduced that seemed somewhat to take the attention from them. Particularly, the presence of the Governor's daughter at the end. What was she to that mother at such a time? Indeed, was it well to have the governor's daughter come to the prison with the pardon? Everything in a drama has definite meaning. What relationship does this trip imply between her and that mother of that man? Her coming was merely an attempt to add interest to the situation, and it failed. Again, the telephone between the governor and the prison should have transmitted the message, or some fierce storm should have been shown as the cause of the breakdown; something that would have seemed like the hand of fate. The incident wasn't necessary. There were other means to accomplish the same thing. The governor might have been ten miles away inspecting a sham battle, and his daughter might have hunted for him in a motor-car, asking here and there fruitlessly. It is all too direct, sure and plain as it is, and it isn't exciting. When she has found the governor there might be only ten minutes left by his watch. The governor would have power to order linemen to cut a telephone wire for him to send a message. As the man gave him the wire there might be only two minutes left. This would have heightened the possibilities of the situation in the warden's outer office. In fact, this drama has stronger possibilities than any photoplay I have seen, but these were not wholly utilized.

London Letter.

By A. E. Taylor.

As showing the great strides that the moving picture has made in this country I may say that there are now some 4,000 electric theaters in the United Kingdom and it is computed that no fewer than 1,200,000 persons attend these places of entertainment every evening. Taking into account the daytime audiences it is safe to say that three millions visit the theaters each day and that the takings may be estimated at £50,000 per day.

The latest phase of objection to the kinematograph is the inconvenience the filming of events causes those who are present at them. At the recent prize fight in France there were loud cries by members of the audience that the glaring arc lights necessary for the exposure of the films caused annoyance and at one time it looked as if there would be trouble. By the aid of some of the English competitors for films the bother was smoothed over for the time being, but there is likely to be a recurrence of the trouble at an early date.

I learn that the Natural Color Kinematograph Company, Ltd., 80-82 Wardour Street, W., has just entered into important contracts to take advertising-industrial films in Kinemacolor for Government and business purposes. The immense advantages of a complete range of color in films of this kind will be apparent.

To go into details, the National Cash Register Company has commissioned Mr. Urban to secure comprehensive pictures of their large works at Dayton, Ohio, U. S. A., and the size of the undertaking may be judged from the fact that the contract price is almost $30,000. An expert staff is being dispatched to Ohio with complete developing plant, etc. In order to get a general view of the extensive premises of the National Cash Register Company it has been arranged to use a captive balloon, and from the commanding position thus obtained a portion of the film will be exposed.

Other large industrial concerns, recognizing the superiority of records of manufacturing process presented with the degree of actuality that Kinemacolor affords, are negotiating for similar series of films.

On May 6 Mr. J. Mackenzie and a staff of assistants are leaving London for Canada in fulfillment of an agreement entered into by the Natural Color Company with the Canadian Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway to illustrate the natural and scenic advantages of Canada in the Kinemacolor process. A special car has been built by the C. P. R. Company with dark-room facilities, sleeping and culinary accommodation, etc. In this car the operators will travel from the Atlantic to the Pacific, their moving headquarters being sidetracked at various points while they exploit the scenery and interesting sights in the neighborhood.

Kinemacolor at the Scala has appealed so to the tastes of its patrons that Mr. Chas. Urban has felt constrained to remove the operetta from the bill and devote the whole performance to pictures. However, he has enlarged the program and some very fine dramatics as well as educationals are now included in the program. At the same time I cannot help inclining to the opinion that the chances of success of the venture at the Scala are somewhat a doubtful matter. This is much to be regretted, as Kinemacolor is really beautiful and there is a great future for it in the picture industry.

Mr. R. E. Aitken, of the Western Import and Film Company, is on his way to your country. His company has done remarkably well since its advent into film land here, for its product is really good, and what is more important, it is handled by men who would make a success of anything.

New Jersey.—The Colonial, 6th and Market Street, Camden, N. J., is a new theater that will open on May 30th. It is up-to-date in every particular, with a seating capacity of 550. Jay C. Wilson is the manager. He is a new recruit to the 10-cent amusement field, but has a ripe experience in larger ventures back of him, the success of which promises that he will make good in his new vocation.

MADE FORTUNE IN SOUTH AMERICA.

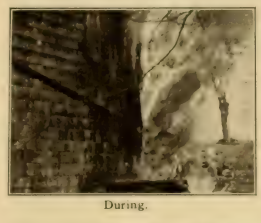
Six years ago, Joseph Behan, of Baldwin, L. I., mortgaged his home in that village and with the proceeds gathered together a large number of second-hand reels of moving pictures and other necessary paraphernalia. With these he made his way to Brazil, where he has since been the leading exhibitor of pictures. He made money from the start, but now that competition has entered into the situation, he feels that he may as well retire with $75,000 to the good than stay there and burn it up fighting ruinous opposition. Mr. Behan returned to the States late in April. He will not return to South America, but will probably look for a site in New York City upon which to build a theater.

ANOTHER FIRE FILM FROM THANHOUSER.

A pretty country house basks peacefully in the golden sunlight—a few minutes elapse and it is a roaring, seething furnace. The one minute you see two lovers talking pleasantly in front of the pretty manor; the next you see of them is in retreat from a mere wooden frame that belches smoke and flame. Such are the sights that are presented to your vision through the ingenuity and enterprise of the twentieth century film producer.

Before.

A short space of years ago, when the filming of an onrushing train or a galloping squad of cavalry was considered most remarkable, the total destruction of a house for a moving picture was a feat never even dreamed of. And so you can consider "Flames and Fortune," which the Independent exhibitors should book now to secure after its release on Friday, June 16, as a real epoch marker and something that will reflect real credit on your show-picking ability.



During.

After.

Film men who have seen the picture call it a masterpiece of realism, something that is easily the best film of a sensational kind the Independent side has yet developed. The Thanhouser people, who produced the film, extend their thanks to the New Rochelle, N. Y., Fire Department, who kindly stood by during the burning of the house to see that the flames did not extend to adjoining property.

New Los Angeles Picture Palace.

The College Theatre, one more of Mr. Hyman's enterprises to minister to the public, opened December 14, matinee to an appreciative audience. The theater is of brick construction and covers the full width and depth of the lot on Broadway, Los. The theatre was designed by Hunt & Burns, local architects. The design is many ways resembles the Renaissance of Paris. The front of the building is decorated with an intricate design of white and to the height of the three sculptural groups the central figures of which hold each a globe composed of a fine globe. Above the sculptured groups and extending to the roof cornice, the front is laid out in marked squares tinted in a light orange color.

The lobby is wainscoted to a height of ten feet with selected white Italian marble. On the sides of the marble wainscoting, at a heighth of five feet, are placed four small decorative panels of leaded art glass; two on each side of the lobby. Above the marble wainscoting are five pairs of leaded art glass windows with mahogany sashes. These windows are lighted from the inner side by the use of 165 8's. The box office is also wainscoted in marble. Above the plate glass, extends a decorative bronze grill. The ceiling of the lobby is in white plaster from which is suspended two square 12-inch drop-lights with leaded art glass panels, each of the four panels representing a phase of college athletic life in which appear athletes in college athletic costumes. The floor of the lobby is of white tile, with marble door thresholds, and a colored design reading: "COLLEGE THEATER." The entrance doors are of solid mahogany. The exit doors facing the street are of Gothic design.

The auditorium contains many commendable features new to moving picture theater construction. The height of the auditorium is twenty-nine feet. The walls are tinted in a light green, and the plaster decorations in a light orange with gold leaf and white trimmings. The ceiling is arched and paneled in white with stenciled borders in gold and green. The ceiling contains six circular ventilators with bronze grills. The side walls of the auditorium support four eighteen-inch fans on each side, and between them are hung art glass side-lights in miniature of the lobby drop-lights. The railing about the orchestra, the bases, door facings and stairway leading to the operator's room, are of mahogany. The screen is roomy and on each side of it are two singing boothes.

The tapestries of the auditorium are of valour with dark green inside face, and other side plum colored. At the rear of the auditorium are retiring rooms for both men and women, with a maid in attendance in the latter. The seats are upholstered in light green leather, with brass-plated standards, and backs in dark green enamel. The seats are large and roomy and well spaced for the comfort of patrons. The carpets are of green. On the right of the auditorium an exit passage way four feet six inches in width connects with the side auditorium exits and extends down to the stage.

The orchestra consists of six pieces and is under the leadership of Miss Lillian May Lancaster, a noted composer, and known the country over as the newsboys' friend. The orchestra will feature the college music of the different universities.

A notable decorative feature of the auditorium is a series of banners six feet long by four wide containing the seals and pennants in gold and college colors of the following universities: Yale, Harvard, Cornell, Princeton, Pennsylvania, Chicago, Michigan, California, Stanford, Southern California, and other well known universities.

The operating room is thoroughly fire-proofed with asbestos and sheet iron, and contains a roomy ceiling ventilator. The best of electrical fixtures have been installed, and two Edison projectoscopes.

The program consists of five reels of the best of first-run Independent films, and several song specialties.

The admission prices charged are 10 and 15, with five-cent admission for the children. Young men ushers, in uniforms of blue, with white braided trimmings, look after the seating of patrons. The musicians' uniforms are white graduation college gowns and white square college caps to match.

The many lights used in the sign, lobby and front of the building are of white globes.

The Kiski Theater—Vandergrift, Pa.

We reproduce herewith a picture of the Kiski Theater, Vandergrift, Pa., and it is one of the tidiest looking little picture houses that one would care to enter, as may be readily seen by a glance at the illustration herewith.

The interior decorations are comparatively plain when contrasted with some of the ornate interiors which have been shown in these pages. But nevertheless there is something about the simple decoration of this house that appeals to us. Instead of naming it the Kiski Theater, they might have called it the "Sanitary Theater," as the illustration herewith would suggest, for above all else, it looks clean and neat; like some lady's parlor, of which she might well be proud.

The cleanly look about this place makes it inviting, and when it comes to moving pictures, cleanliness really ought to come before godliness. As we write this we have an idea that we could put in a very enjoyable afternoon in such a place as this, with its tidy aisles and its tasty side lamps, and its plain but dignified walls with the neat panels. There is an air of restfulness about it, and we can see at a glance that the picture is high up where all can see it, which is one of the main things after all in every picture house. In this little article, of course, we can only go half way or perhaps not quite that far. If the exterior aspect is as inviting as the interior appears to be, and the projection and music are equally as good, we should say that the Kiski Theater of Vandergrift, Pa., is a veritable little gem and fully entitled to term itself, in every sense of that well worn phrase, "A moving picture parlor."

The seating capacity of this little house is 340, which is more than appearances would indicate. They have a steel operating booth in which are installed two Powers machines. We understand they show a very clear picture upon one of the latest aluminum screens. The house is under the management of Mr. L. Elswick.

Child Welfare Exhibit in Chicago.

The Child Welfare Exhibit of Chicago is the all-absorbing topic of the week. Never before has an exhibit been attempted of such gigantic proportions and of such appealing human interest. The project was made possible through the generosity and untiring propaganda of Mrs. Ira McCormick, who subscribed $30,000. The exhibit was opened Thursday, May 11, at 6 P. M., by Miss Jane Addams, the Hull House leader and civic worker, and carries a special interest, as motion pictures and illustrated lectures are featured as attractions and demonstrating material. The Coliseum, its annex and part of the roof have been utilized for the different displays, occupying a space of 72,000 square feet. For the first time in the history of the city, an exhibit has been planned on which no line has been drawn—of race, color, religion or party—Catholic, Protestant and Jew have worked side by side for the welfare of the children of Chicago. In the matter of attendance, this exhibit will break all records. It is believed that the exhibit will have over one million visitors during the two weeks it is to be opened. In this unique war are for race betterment, the moving pictures take a prominent position, and elaborate arrangements have been provided to make feasible a projection for an audience of five thousand in broad daylight or at night in the glare of a multitude of electric light bulbs. A stage has been erected for a chorus of 1,500 school children, and back of the stage is suspended a daylight curtain furnished by the Sun Light Metallic Cloth Curtain Co. The pictures projected on this curtain were really remarkable in perspective and delicate shades, and fully as bright and plastic as in the darkest auditorium. Among the subjects on the screen were Edison's "Red Cross Seal"—the anti-tuberculosis film—and "Starting the Baby Right"—an Essanay that received many approving exclamations from delighted mothers. Wandering through the different exhibits, our attention was atracted to the following display of statistics, headed:

CONSTRUCTIVE AND DESTRUCTIVE AGENCIES OF CHICAGO.

AFFECTING THE WELFARE OF CHILDREN

July, 1910. Compiled by Amelie Valerio for the JUVENILE PROTECTION ASSOCIATION OF CHICAGO

The report embraced dance halls, excursion steamers and also five and ten cent theaters, and reads as follows:

Chicago theaters seat 93,000.
32,000 children attend daily.
Conditions in 1909.
405 five and ten cent theaters.
216 violations of the law and ordinances found in two inquests.
Crowds of children fill the entrances of most theaters.
Advertisements and posters, sensational; barkers, vulgar.
Darkness inside a cover for familiarity and immorality.
Ventilation very bad; exhibits inadequate; building and fire ordinances disregarded.
Pictures showing crime, immorality and revenge.
Boys frequently committed burglary, murder and other violent crimes as a result of lessons taught.

RESULTS OF INVESTIGATION.

A censorship bureau for films established.
Dangers to young girls made public.
Police, health and building departments aroused.

CONDITIONS IN 1911.

208 five and ten cent theaters.
Only eight violations of the Child Labor Law.
Only eleven with bad posters.
Only eight with disorderly crowds outside.
No possibility of adequate ventilation in twenty-nine.
Bad ventilation in seventy-two.
Only four theaters without wall lights burning during the performance.
Adequate exits in all buildings.
Twenty-eight exits without lights.
Films show censorship bureau to be efficient.
Majority of films humorous or melodramatic.
Constantly increasing number giving useful instruction in History, Geography and Hygiene.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

Places and not people should be licensed.
Amateur nights should be abolished.
All posters and advertisements should be censored by the censorship bureau.

THE BOARD OF CENSORSHIP.

A National Board of Censorship should not go by set rules, but use some common sense and have a fair knowledge of social and economic questions. Many films have been passed by the National Board of Censorship that should have been rejected, as it they do not show an actual murder, suicide or burglary, they convey bad ideas to the weak-minded. The Reliance comes out with a production called "Locked Out." I am not against unions nor bitter against the trusts, but I ask just and fair play and I condemn all literature, exciting labor against capital or capital against labor. If the members of the Board of Censorship wanted to use a little discretion in their verdicts, they would not allow certain pictures to pass, but it seems that these gentlemen are devoid of good judgment. They should have rejected the Kalem picture against the Japs. It is a matter of record that California objected to the picture.

The Reliance shows us the bitterness of capital against labor. Is it right? Is it fair to excite the masses by showing them innocent women killed in their fight for their daily bread? No, it is not right as we know that if some capitalists are hard on the laboring class, we know also that many strikes are not justified and would have never been ordered, if it had not been to serve the personal interests of some leaders or walking delegates. The mind of the working class has been so enraged against capital, that many, too many, leaders have overstepped their usefulness and have become autocrats themselves and the greatest danger to the workingman of today is not from capital, but from these union leaders.

The Reliance producer for sensational effect showed the murder of innocent women, without considering the evil consequences of such a picture.

The Board of Censorship should wake up and use a little more of the power invested in them, to suppress highly sensational pictures. F. M. S.

CIRCULARIZING BUFFALO JONES PICTURES.

The New Bijou Theater, of Edmonton, Alberta, Canada, sends us a well gotten up four-page advertising folder announcing the coming of the Buffalo Jones pictures. The manager of this house has used as the body of their circular the bulk of the descriptive matter on the Buffalo Jones pictures exactly as printed in the Moving Picture World, issue of February 25, and we are surprised to note how well it adapts itself to a circular of this kind. Those of our readers who are booking the Buffalo Jones pictures, we would advise to follow this example, which will save them considerable time and work, besides making a readable and interesting circular to circulate publicly. The front page of the circular before us is arranged in title fashion, the remaining three pages being solid reading matter from the text of the description published in this paper.

The more popular the theater is and the larger the audiences, the more it becomes necessary for the management to look into the question of ventilation and cleanliness. A valuable adjunct to proper ventilation is the use of a good disinfectant every day, especially when the house is being cleaned.

The odorless or perfumed Atlas disinfectant of the Atlas Supply Company, Manayunk, Philadelphia, Pa., is one of the well-known articles on the market for this purpose and for which they are having a ready sale. As the hot season approaches, the use of a good disinfectant will become more imperative.

The Atlas Company are also distributors of Comes film cement. One might say that it is an evidence of the magnitude of the film business when we learn that nearly fifty thousand bottles of this article have been sold in the past year and a half.

We have received this week a certain amount of literature from the New York headquarters of an institution designated as the National Association of Moving Picture Exhibitors, among which is a set of by-laws and the constitution, as well as matter setting forth the reasons and object of its being. In brief, it seems to be a self-constituted affair in the nature of a moving picture law office. We are not acquainted with any of its officers or directors, therefore can make no authoritative statement as to its worthiness or unworthiness. The literature that has been sent to us is of course too voluminous for publication and the above facts are passed on to our readers for what they are worth. When we are better informed as to this proposition we will comment further.

Los Angeles.

By Richard V. Spencer.

American.—The American Film Manufacturing Company have established a studio at Lakeside, Cal. Lakeside is a picturesque town 22 miles from the city of San Diego. An interview with Mr. A. M. Kennedy, president and general manager of the company, discloses the fact that the Lakeside studio will be the permanent headquarters of the American's Western stock company. The surrounding country is ideal for the production of Western stories on which it is the policy of the company to specialize.

The acting talent of the Western company now numbers 14 people, exclusive of the extra people employed from time to time. Two dramatic directors are in charge of the studio, permitting the release of two reels of Western films per week. Mr. Allan Dwan is the producer in charge. Mr. Dwan is one of the most ambitious and hard-working playrights of the younger school. In the progress of his work for the company he has written and produced many of the American films.

The second division of the Western stock company will be under the management and dramatic direction of Mr. Charles Earle, who has had many years' experience in moving picture work.

During the progress of the interview, Mr. Kennedy said: "The Chicago stock company will henceforth be used as a subsidiary organization to fill in stories on short Western reels. The Western stock company will confine themselves to the production of strictly Western pictures. Mr. Allan Dwan will be producing director. We have also a new leading lady, Miss Bush. She has had many years of dramatic experience, and has been playing leads in legitimate stock. She is an extremely good rider; has a fine stage presence; is young and pretty, and is very strong on emotional parts.

Mr. Warren Kerrigan, leading man in the Western stock company, formerly with Essanay, has been with the American since its inception. I was astonished to learn that Mr. Kerrigan was a fine horseman, he having previously played only society parts with the company. Mr. Hamilton is no longer in charge. Mr. Beal is no longer connected with the American Company.

This Western company (referring to that portion of the stock company under the direction of Mr. Dwan) is going to produce one Western drama each week. We are going to turn out a second reel of split reel comedy Westerns—combining the three elements of popularity, which every exchangeman considers THE thing."

Mr. Kennedy has spent the past three weeks in Los Angeles and vicinity, and has joined the army of boosters for California scenery and climate, which he declares is beyond criticism from the point of view of the film manufacturer. Mr. Kennedy left for Chicago May 6th.

Bison Actors Work for Charity.—Saturday, the 6th, will see the members of the Bison Stock Company on the downtown streets in costume, aiding in the disposal of the 300,000 charity tags which the Associated Charities of Los Angeles hope to sell at 10c each, in order to provide the funds for their yearly work among the city's poor and needy. Prominent in the ranks of the salesmen will be the following members of the Bison Company: Miss Mona Dark Feather, Frank Lawson, Madeline West, Geo. Gebhart, Agnes Stanley, and Mary C. Thornton. The City's legitimate stock companies and the performers appearing at the local vaudeville theaters will also take part and help sell the tags by automobile campaigns in the downtown streets.

Selig Films City Fire Department.—The Selig Company's cameraman this week took several hundred feet of film depicting firemen from the different hose, truck, and engine companies of the city risking their lives performing feats on the newly erected six-story drill tower on the grounds of Engine Company No. 1, in East Los Angeles. During the progress of the drill, the firemen "rescued" 120-pound dummies from the imaginary burning structure, scaled six stories with pompier ladders and made daring leaps into life nets. Other drills consisted of carrying up hose, attaching hose to standpipes on the various stories, taking up ropes and letting down dummies, etc., the most interesting of which were recorded by the moving picture camera. The drill was taken for the benefit of the Selig Polyscope Company, which some time ago presented the city with a certified $1,000 check for the privilege of filming the city firemen in drill manoeuvers and in action at real fires. The ink was hardly dry on the check before a $250,000 fire broke out in the downtown district. The Selig Company were immediately notified, and with their cameraman and several actors were soon on the scene. The film was recently exhibited at the studio to a small audience, who, the writer is informed, pronounced the photography excellent, considering the difficulties under which the cameraman worked. The film has been sent East and will soon appear under the Selig trademark.

Pathe.—William E. Fontaine, road manager of "The Rejuvenation of Aunt Jane" company, playing this week at the Mason Theater, and T. P. Getz, a San Diego man, were visitors at the Pathe studio on the third. While there they watched the work of the Pathe stock company in an interior scene being directed by Mr. Young Deer.

Kalem.—For the past few days the Kalem Company have been at work in the semi-desert country between Fernando and Newhall. The writer recently paid a visit to the studio of the company at Verduga Park, near Glendale. Mr. Kenan Buel, dramatic director and general manager of the Kalem Westren stock company, on being interviewed, said that he came to Southern California with the intention of only staying three months, but so satisfied has he become with the scenic and climatic advantages of the country that he has decided to lengthen his stay to three years, and is making preparations to that end. Extensive improvements are under way at the studio in preparation for a series of big films, the nature of which Mr. Buel is keeping to himself until they are ready for release. Mr. Buel presented the writer with a group picture of the company, which will soon appear in The World. Next week the company will put on, under the direction of Mr. Buel, a big film of early California life in the period of the old Mission days. The story of the film was written around an incident of real life that happened at the time. The scenes will center about the San Luis Rey Mission, one of the most beautiful and least photographed missions of the Southwest.

Biograph to Return East.—The Biograph Company, comprising some seventy-five people, have completed arrangements to return to their Eastern studio for summer work. They will leave Los Angeles May 21, and will work in the East until late in December, when they are expected to return and occupy their Los Angeles studio again. The company this year have put on a series of beautiful films, the marine films being probably the most appreciated—at least, by Western picture fans with whom the writer has talked.

Jack Conway, formerly leading man for the Bison Stock Company, has joined the Selig Western company. J. B. Sherry has also left the Bison company and will be seen in future Selig Western productions.

Red Wing (who in private life is the wife of Mr. Young Deer, the Pathe director) returned Friday from a two months' visit to New York City.

Pathe.—The proposed trip of the Pathe Company to Tia Juana, Mexico, has been postponed for the present. Tia Juana at this writing is one of the centers of the Mexican war zone, and permission to cross the line would be hard to get, if not impossible.

James L. Magee, business manager for the Selig Polyscope Company, has just returned from a business trip to Riverside, Cal.

Selig Company Go North.—The Selig second company, under the management and direction of Mr. Hobart Bosworth, will leave in two private cars for the Yosemite Valley on the 20th. They are taking along a stage coach and fifteen head of horses. The second company plans to be gone about three months, most of which will be spent in the Valley and vicinity. Among the members of the Selig company going north are J. B. Sherry, Jack Conway, Mr. Dared and wife, Leo Pierson, Roy Watson and wife, and little girl; Mrs. Charlie Eyton, Miss Barry, Miss Adele Bosworth, Dell Eagles, Harry Paget, Art Acord and B. H. Daniels.

Los Angeles Exhibitors.

New Independent Exchange.—The California Film Exchange of San Francisco have purchased the stock and lease of the Western Film Company, of Los Angeles, and have installed their offices and supply rooms at 514 S. Los Angeles St., formerly occupied by the Western Film Company. They are buying twelve reels of Independent film and will add to their buying orders as the trade warrants.

Legislation Pigeon-Holed.—The Strobridge Bill Amendments that have been awaiting the governor's signature to become a law, and against which a powerful lobby of moving picture men have been fighting, has been pigeon-holed by the Governor. It is said that the bill will be laid over for the next meeting of the legislature some two years hence. The amendments to the original bill were bitterly contested by state exchangemen and exhibitors.

New Aairdome at San Bernardino opened recently with Independent service secured through the Los Angeles exchange of Miles Brothers. Mr. Gillete is the proprietor.

Arthur S. Hyman, president of the Hyman chain of theaters, is about to become a Moose. A jolly bunch of local moving picture cowboys, and other local celebrities, joyously assert that they will be present at his initiation, and promise that the initiation ceremonies will be thoroughly done. Mr. Daniel S. Markowitz, manager of the local branch of the California Film Exchange, and president and general manager of the Co-operative Film Mfg. Co., himself a Moose, also promises to see that Mr. Hyman is thoroughly initiated in the new order.

Majestic, of Redlands, formerly using Licensed pictures, is the latest recruit to the Independent ranks. The lease of the house has changed hands, and will henceforth be under the proprietorship of Messrs. Mather & Nesse. The new lessees will make alterations to the house and run it in a first-class manner. The firm are well known in moving picture circles throughout Southern California.

Incorporation.—Articles of incorporation were filed recently with Secretary of State Jordan by the Arthur S. Hyman Amusement Company; directors: Arthur S. Hyman, P. Bayffeld Gibson, and Bert Gerson; capital stock, $50,000.

Hyman and College Theaters Go Independent.—The Hyman, 8th and Broadway, and The College, 5th and Hill Streets, have both gone Independent. Both houses are strictly high class Hyman enterprizes. Since February 1st they have been using Licensed service. The change goes into effect Monday, the 6th. The two theaters are using four reels each of first run Independent service, and four acts of vaudeville. Previous to the 6th, the College used only pictures, but on and after this date four acts of vaudeville will also be shown.

Petitions Against Sunday Picture Show.—Rival petitions on the question of Sunday closing of Sawtelle, Cal., picture shows were filed recently with the town trustees. The one asking that the picture shows be closed on Sundays carried only 73 signatures, while the one favoring open doors for these houses on Sundays was signed by 380. No action has yet been taken by the town trustees regarding the matter.

Hyman's Venice Theater.—"The Neptune," on which work is progressing rapidly, will not be able to open May 15th as planned. The new theater will be first-class in every particular, comparing favorably with the best in appointments. Mr. Hyman has just signed up for Independent service for the new house. Like the other Hyman enterprises, vaudeville will play an important part. The theater will be opened to the beach public on May 22 and record breaking patronage during the summer months is an assured fact.

Incorporation.—Articles of incorporation were filed recently by the Thomson-Snow Amusement Company; capital stock $55,000; directors in the new corporation are: J. D. Thomson, H. C. Snow, and C. H. Falenbaugh.

More Censorship.—The advisability of asking the appointment of a theatrical censor committee, the discussion of moving picture supervision, in addition to that furnished by the National Board of Censorship of New York, and the indorsement of Deputy City Prosecutor Guy Eddie's efforts to prohibit improper shows, and other things of more or less importance to theatrical interests, were discussed at a recent meeting of local club women, clergymen, educators, and a few moving picture exhibitors at the Federation club rooms. The moving pictures shown in Los Angeles received high praise, and Mr. Nixon, president of Southern California Exhibitors' Association, promised his hearty co-operation with the committee in securing the best of films to be shown under due legal restrictions and in sufficiently lighted rooms.

Butlers'.—408 South Hill Street, have changed their service from Independent to Licensed, and are now using three second runs of the latter.

Beach Business Booming.—Excellent business is reported by the West Coast beach exhibitors in Santa Monica, Venice, Ocean Park, and Redondo. All report a very prosperous season, which has begun unusually early and promises to extend late into California's so-called winter season. Clune's new theater on the Fraser Pier is scheduled to open on Decoration Day. The theater is well under way and will probably open on schedule time. With the completion of this theater the West Coast beaches will have two up to date first class theaters with large seating capacity and first class attractions.

Prosperity Note.—Mr. Fred Dawes, manager of Miles Brothers local exchange, has purchased an automobile. He says that he needs it for banking purposes and to facilitate the rapid delivery of films. Next!

To Stop Lobby Crowding.—Chief of Police Sebastian has ordered police captains to prevent crowding in theater lobbies. Scores of complaints have been filed with the police against the practice of theatergoers crowding the lobbies at vaudeville and motion picture theaters. The police will try to remedy this by compelling the ticket holders to form in line while awaiting admission to the theaters.

Itala Masterpiece Praised.—The recent big Itala release, "The Fall of Troy," received much praise by Western picture patrons, who in talks with the writer, pronounced it the biggest and most spectacular film ever shown in the West. The film was shown here at the Shell, and at the Hyman, and drew crowded houses at both theaters. It will next be shown at the beaches, where exhibitors have been advertising it lavishly.

Arrow Goes Independent.—The Arrow Theater, in the Hamburger Building, 8th, Broadway and Hill, has gone Independent. This theater has been a Licensed house ever since its inception. The theater will use second run Independent service beginning May 15.

Pasadenans Interested in Tournament Pictures.—The Selig Special Release educational film picturing the Pasadena Tournament of Roses, taken January 1 last, is being eagerly awaited by the public of Pasadena. The film pictures the beautiful annual pageant held every New Year's day in the Crown City. The film will be shown first at Clune's Pasadena Theater.

Crown.—The lease of the Crown is reported to have changed hands at a recent date. The house is now using later run Independent pictures. It is said that new improvements and alterations are planned.

Picture.—The Picture Theater, Main Street between 5th and Sixth, are making alterations to their foyer. It has been newly repainted, and big candle-power Tungsten lights in attractive globes have been installed.

Arrowhead.—The new theater being erected at Long Beach for The California Motion Picture Mfg. Co., will be opened Saturday, the 13th, with Independent service. The company will picture their own productions until they succeed in making arrangements to enter the producing field and market their work.

Washington D. C.

Airdomes are increasing in popularity and number. The Crandall, Truxton, Starlight, Staunton, Northeast, Maycroft, and Imp Park are now on the list. Some of these mean the extinguishing of the lights in houses that have displayed pictures during the winter. Imp Park is under the management of Harry Warder, who has closed his Colonial, while the Truxton, under Manager Coblenz, included both the house and park of the same, and the show shifts from one to the other according to the weather and the season.

J. Boyd Dexter, who recently severed his connection with the Washington Film Exchange, is again manager of an exchange of his own, for it must be remembered that Mr. Dexter is the pioneer Independent film man of Washington. In connection with this service, he also has an extensive sign trade for the motion picture theaters.

A matter which has been bothering the exhibitors of motion pictures here at different times is the Sunday Bill, which calls for the closing of all amusements on that day. The large theaters are not open in Washington except for a lecture or concert, but the motion picture houses open at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. There is at present a bill before the House of Representatives which asks for the closing of all amusements on Sunday. In order to meet this matter squarely with unity, and at the proper time, those interested in the bill have formed an organization known as the Washington Exhibitors' Association. Every reliable house is or promises to be represented to protect its interests, and there is every reason to believe that the organization will be a moving factor for unity among the motion picture men here. The officers are: President A. C. Bay, treasurer A. Brylawsky and secretary I. Brylawsky, who succeeded Wm. F. Mack in the same office at the preliminary meeting. Mr. Bay is manager of the Niagara, while both of the Brylawskys are connected with a chain of picture theaters at various parts of the city. This organization thinks then first about to attack the Sunday Bill as the proper measure. It appears that one phase of the matter will be to secure the opinion of the patrons of the motion picture theaters to present to the Committee in Congress. We will hear later what the Washington Exhibitors Association has accomplished.

Louisville.

E. S. Dyehouse, well known insurance man of Louisville, who has achieved fame through having assisted in the manufacture of what is said to have been the first moving picture machine to exercise, recently came into the picture limelight again when he applied for patent rights upon a process which promises to revolutionize photography. The Dyehouse process, it is asserted, enables plate photographs or pictures of any kind to be developed and printed in the broad light of day, without any cumbersome apparatus and the wonderful room of abolishing the dark room.

It is reported that a syndicate of local capital is being formed at Maysville, Ky., to establish a moving picture house to compete with the Pastime and the Washington theaters in that city. The new house will be one of the largest and most up-to-date in that section of the State, and will probably be located in the White Building in Maysville.

George E. Bloch, who has for several seasons successfully managed the Airdome in Hopkinsville, Ky., is making preparations to open his old stand for the summer within the next few days on a bigger, better and brighter scale than ever before. As a preliminary advertising feature, Mr. Bloch has donated the house to the Hopkinsville Elks for the first week of its summer career, and the proceeds derived from the series of days will be turned over to that organization to rebuild its lodge rooms in Hopkinsville, which were recently destroyed by fire.

Marcus Loew, of New York City, who owns and operates a chain of vaudeville and picture houses numbering more than 100 all over the country, stopped at the Seelbach several days investigating local conditions and negotiating for a site and other details concerning a $500,000 playhouse which he proposes to erect here. The house, when completed, will be one of the most beautiful of its kind in Dixie, and will carry a bill of vaudeville interspersed with picture exhibitions. Prices will probably rule about the ten, twenty and thirty standard. Mr. Loew stated that he could make no definite statement concerning the location of his local property until he returns to this city a couple of months from now and begins active arrangements for the construction of the house.

Work upon the handsome new theater which will be occupied by M. Switow, of New Albany, on Fourth Avenue, between Green and Walnut Streets, will be begun in a short time. The new house will cost about $30,000 and will be up-to-date in every respect, having the advantage of a fine down-town site to begin with.

Judge Garrett S. Wall, of Maysville, Ky., who is a member of the State Board of Control for lunacy asylums of Kentucky, says that since the introduction of moving picture exhibitions into asylums and homes for the feeble minded throughout the Bluegrass a marked improvement has been noted in the cases of a number of mildly insane inmates, as well as a favorable effect upon the more violent. The less afflicted ones, said Judge Garrett, are inclined toward more rational talk and actions after viewing the periodic shows, while the incurables move about in a less cowed and maniacal manner, placing more faith in the friendly actions of those around them.

The Princess theater opened last week at Jackson, Ky., under the management of H. M. Bloomfield, who took charge of the house this season for the first time. Mr. Bloomfield is making numerous improvements as the shows progress and business gets better, and promises to make the little playhouse in the Bluegrass one of the most modern in the State before long.

Desberger Bros., who are having a handsome moving picture theater erected in Paducah, Ky., at Fifth Street and Broadway, announced the details of the Arcade, as it will be called, last week. The house will be 22 feet wide and 40 feet deep, seating more than 900 people. Not a particle of wood but the opera chairs will be used in construction, every portion being made of either concrete, brick, steel or glass. Eight roomy exits will preclude possibility of a fire horror, and on the opening night Manager Desberger proposes to give an exhibition of emptying the theater as rapidly as possible by sounding an alarm before an average audience. A roof garden on top of the theater will be an additional feature, soft drinks and light refreshments being served at all hours.

The People's Theatrical Company, at Jackson, Ky., filed articles of incorporation last week, placing its capital stock at $8,000. The company is formed with the purpose of building and operating a chain of moving picture theaters through the State. The incorporators of the new concern are as follows: Sewell Williams, Hannibal Hurst, James Back, R. Muir, T. M. Davidson and J. H. Letton.

According to a recent report to the Louisville correspondent of The Moving Picture World, C. Mortimer Thompson, City Building Inspector of Knoxville, Tenn., is preparing an ordinance pertaining to his department which will compel every theater in the Tennessee city to be equipped with smoke vents to clear the auditorium in case of fire. Mr. Thompson, in urging the passage of this ordinance, says that but two theaters in Knoxville are now equipped with vents, while every house of this kind should be provided with this safety appliance. Mr. Thompson also urges that the theater owners be advised to place automatic sprinkler systems on their stages and about the operating rooms, especially in picture houses, but since this precaution concerns property loss particularly, it is probable that the latter feature will not be incorporated into the ordinance.

New England.

Mr. J. F. Adams, manager of the Colonial Theater, Lowell, Mass., has closed his house over the "heated term" after an unusually fine run of business during this season. The Colonial will reopen in August.

Mr. L. M. Boas, general manager of the Marcus Loew enterprises in Fall River, Mass., has severed his connection with the Bijou and Premier theaters. Mr. Boas will very shortly leave this country for Europe, making headquarters in Paris, where he will become the head of a corporation booking foreign vaudeville acts into American theaters. Mr. Charles Benson, who has had the valuable experience of several years' training under Mr. Boas, as assistant to him, has already taken up the active management of the large houses.

Mr. Thomas Hughes has purchased the Star Theater, Solomon Falls, N. H., from Messrs. Berlanger and Plummer, and will continue to operate the theater as a moving picture and vaudeville house.

The Star Airdome, Meriden, Conn., is nearly ready for its opening, which will take place on Decoration Day, May 30.

Lincoln Park Worcester, Mass., has been opened by the Worcester Street Railroad Company. The corporation evidently knows the great drawing power of the picture and is giving free performances of moving pictures at the park.

Mr. Tom Whyte, manager of the Academy of Music, Lowell, Mass., devoted to "pop" vaudeville and pictures, has resigned his managerial position, to take up active charge of Mr. J. J. Flynn's office. Mr. Flynn is running many parks and open-air shows through the summer, as is his usual custom. Mr. Flynn expects to use Licensed service in his theaters this year. Mr. Whyte may be back at the Academy of Music in the fall.

Mr. George Davis, of Salem, Mass., who is interested in the picture game, recently made a trip to New York, looking things over.

Pequot Park, Westfield, Mass., a summer resort, will open May 30. Pequot Park always shows a good share of moving pictures as one of its attractions.

The Pastime Theater, Lowell, Mass., has a new manager in the person of Frederick Miller, who was connected with the Alhambra, also of Lowell. Mr. Miller knows the "ropes," and should make a good executive for the Pastime.

Westfield, Mass., will possess a large and up-to-date theater next fall, devoted to "pop" vaudeville and pictures, as ground has already been broken for the new house. The house, not yet named, has an excellent location, on the corner of Elm and Bartlett Streets, the main thoroughfare of the city. The Gaiety Amusement Company has leased the house, upon its completion, from Mr. John M. O'Donnell. The Gayety company will be without a theater in Westfield for a short while, as its lease on their remaining Westfield theater will expire July 1.

Manager M. C. Blumenberg, of the Casco Theater, Portland, Me., introduced a decided innovation when he offered what he called "Children's Week" for his patrons. Pictures especially suitable for the young folks, a youthful singer of illustrated songs, and other similar features made up an attractive program. Manager Blumenberg is offering worthy programs of pictures, novelties and songs to a pleasing run of trade.

As was stated in these columns previously, the Nickel Theater, of Bangor, Me., which was destroyed by the fire in that city, will rebuild. Union Street has been chosen as the location of the New Nickel by Manager Atkinson.

Manager Moe Mark of the Comique Theater, Lynn, Mass., is doing well with pictures, songs, and Mr. Fred Rea lecturing on the feature reel. Amateur nights, Tuesday and Friday, are in the nature of a success, judging from the crowds which attend this feature. HENRY.

In The Mississippi Valley.

Chief of Police Bergen at Rockford, Ill., has served notice on the moving picture theaters of that city that no more prizes may be given to lucky holders of tickets, as it is a violation of the ordinances of the city and also of the State law.

C. S. L. Bennett, of Charleston, Ill., will operate the airdome in that city again this summer, featuring moving pictures.

C. B. Burkhardt will furnish free moving pictures each Saturday night at an attraction at Homer Park, near Homer, Ill.

Milwaukee school children are to be made the subject of an interesting experiment in the next two months. The Wisconsin Anti-Tuberculosis Association will employ motion pictures in an educational campaign in the schools. The University Extension division is working in co-operation with the association to determine the value of the film as an educator.

The show will be preceded by a lecture to the pupils in the afternoon by Harvey Dee Brown, general lecturer of the Anti-Tuberculosis Association. Dr. Brown also has charge of the pictures.

The first of these lectures and shows was given last month in Madison, and nine schools were visited. The final lecture and exhibition was given in the assembly chamber of the Capitol and was used as an instructive means to further a bill giving counties the right to erect county sanatoria for consumptives.

Plans have been completed for a $30,000 moving picture theater to be erected at Eleventh Avenue and Washington Street, Milwaukee, to be owned by John Brummer and managed by Edward J. Wagner.

Architects' plans for the new Butterfly moving picture theater on Grand Avenue between Second and Third Streets, Milwaukee, have been completed. The building will be 42½ x 150 feet and will seat 1,200 persons. It will be forty feet high inside and will have a balcony. The structure, which is to be fireproof, will cost $50,000.

The Broadway Amusement Company, of St. Louis, has been incorporated with capital stock of $2,000 to do a general amusement business. The incorporators are Thomas J. O'Loughlin, Harry V. Harkins, and William F. Harkins.

The Stone Motion Picture Company, recently incorporated for the purpose of handling the moving pictures of the Morris-Schreck fight, has decided to embark in the moving picture business on a larger scale, with headquarters in Oklahoma City, Okla., it is announced. The company plans a studio, and a stock company, calling for the expenditure of $20,000 to $25,000. The company, which has offices at 817 Colcord Building, Oklahoma City, is composed of president, W. F. Stone, secretary, O. G. Bantley, both of Oklahoma City, and B. B. Burnett, B. C. Burnett and C. W. Willis, all bankers of Sapulpa, Okla.

The Bijou, the vaudeville house at Decatur, Ill., has begun its summer season of moving pictures.

The Daley Theater, home of photoplays, Carlinville, Ill., at its opening invited the public to ask questions in regard to the workings of the machine, believing the patrons were interested in the operation. This proved a good idea. The new theater, which has a capacity of 900, is in charge of Harry Daley, proprietor and manager. Mrs. Georgia Green, pianist and soloist; Miss Fern Hagler, ticket seller, and Richard Dunn, doorkeeper.

Let the newspapers get out the rubber stamp for the head "Blames Picture Shows for Downfall" again. J. Leibsen appeared before the City Council of Des Moines, Iowa, and said his son who was sent to the reform school for stealing, began by taking money in order that he might attend picture shows. Thereupon, with the applause of the gallery already sounding in their ears, and the flash of the press, a councilman drafted an ordinance prohibiting any child under sixteen years of age from attending a moving picture show unaccompanied.

"A friend of mine out on the coast tells me they can see them actors going out every day to pose for a picture. They're regular theatrical people who do the kind of work on the stage. I overheard this recently while watching a production of Selig's "Rod's Conquest" at the Lyric, Springfield, Ill. Few Seligs have gone over like this one in fact, it was given an unusual reception for any film. There were plenty in the theater who were by their emotations and chucklings, agreeing with me that the advent and performance of the "troupers" into the small town were an habitual as any strip of film and reminiscences produced can make them. The tyme alongside me raved at the happy ending but, nevertheless, he had gone back to the barefoot days of adoration before a showbill when the first part of the reel was unwound.

The Star and Majestic theaters of Watseka, Ill., have been sold to young women of Danville, Ill., who will continue to operate them under the name of Hill & Weger. Miss May O. Hill, the senior member of the firm, has been in the moving picture business at Watseka for some time.

Chicago.

Jones, Linick and Schaefer have secured control of the American Music Hall, in partnership with William Morris and Marcus Loew. Negotiations were closed last Monday and a decided change of policy will be adopted. The price of amission will be lowered, but vaudeville still will be the feature. The Orpheum people have sold their interests in Riverview Park—the Royal Gorge, the Scenic Railway and the Derby—to W. F. Merle, of Merle & Heany, for $250,000; also their enterprises in White City.

The Western representative of The Moving Picture World received recently an invitation from the Press Club of Chicago to an exhibition of educational pictures at the Club Rooms. Invitations had been sent broadcast by the entertainment committee to the board of education, to the principals of the schools and to the press. The program was furnished by the courtesy of George Kleine in the endeavor to demonstrate the educational possibilities of the motion pictures. Mr. Kleine deserves great credit in his work in the educational field, and this was another instance of his enterprising propaganda among the class of people that doesn't go to a picture show unless to collect material to evidence the detrimental effects of the motion pictures on the unsophisticated mind of the rising generation.

A great number of people accepted the invitation and the exhibit began with Gaumont's beautiful "Poems in Pictures," followed by "Le Printemps"—a phantasmagoria of spring and life's resemblance to season—a picture of unspeakably artistic effects in scenery and delicate shadings, "In the Pyrenees,"a travel film from Spain; "The Vow, or Jepthah's Daughter," a remarkable Gaumont production from the Biblical History; "Tropical Creatures," a wonderful microcinematograph by Urban-Eclipse; "Alpine Retreat," a stereographical; "Potteries in Thoume," an industrial; "The Death of Admiral Coligny," a drama from the French History; "In Birdland," an excellent telephoto by Urban-Eclipse, and several others.

The audience showed by liberal applause a gratifying interest and appreciation of the exhibition and the beautiful scenic and artistic light effects of the Gaumont pictures brought many an exclamation of admiration.

In an interview with the Western representative of The Moving Picture World, Mr. C. J. Hite, of the H. & H. Film Company, expressed his entire satisfaction of the prevailing business conditions.

The H. & H. said Mr. Hite, is enjoying a better class of business than ever since they entrance into the moving picture field with the Hite & H. Film Service Company owned by the Hutchinson brothers and C. J. Hite. S. S. Hutchinson is the president, C. J. Hite, secretary and treasurer, in charge, G. A. Hutchinson assisting. They are also interested in the American Film Manufacturing Company and have several flourishing exchanges in other parts of the country. The Hite & H. Film Company has recently installed an automobile system of picking up films at night from theaters in the city, carrying them to their inspection rooms and making shipments each night for the out of town customers.

Messrs. Lesserman and Fleckels, of the Lesserman Film Service, have completed arrangements for the construction of an airdome on some property at East Sherman Heights, Ill., and expect to have one of the most up-to-date amusement emporiums in this part of the country. The new airdome will have a seating capacity of 1,200 and will be complete in every detail. Three reels of the Lesserman Service picture will be shown, with two good vaudeville acts and an illustrated song, admission to be ten cents. In connection with the airdome, a dancing pavilion will be opened, and it is expected that with this combination, the manager of East Sheridan will be able to satisfy their summer ardor for amusement.

Mr. Herbert Lett, formerly of the H. & H. Film Exchange has launched forth in his own name to adorn the ranks of industry and will be ready for action in the film arena in the very near future. The reliable Film Exchange in the name under which Mr. Lett will do business at 1508 in the Masonic Building, 190 Dearborn Street.

"What do you play for Cow-boy pictures?" What music is suitable for courtroom scenes?" Should I play Indian music exclusively for Indian pictures, and if so where can I get it? What shall I play for bar-room scenes; for lumber camps, for mining camps?"

These and similar questions are frequently sent to me, nearly always, I am sorry to say, with a request that the letter be not published. Now these requests for privacy are a bit selfish on the part of the writers, if they would only stop to consider it, for whether my suggestions have any value or not, they are asking for personal information which might be interesting to others.

My correspondence has become so large as to make serious inroads upon my time, and as I have treated all such communications confidentially as requested, I have thereby deprived myself of much matter which might be used on this page. For this reason I shall hereafter assume the right to use the substance of any future letter which I think may be of interest to the constituency at large, omitting names and addresses.

Also I shall be compelled to stop answering private communications altogether except in urgent cases where the saving of time is an important factor; such writers will enclose a dollar to insure prompt attention. (At present many of them forget to enclose postage stamps.) Having got this "off my chest," I will go back to the questions which head this article.

"What do you play for Cow-boy pictures?" If you want your music to say "this is a cow-boy," I know of nothing except the cow-boy songs which were popular a few years ago. Many object to these because they are old, but what better can be offered? A few new ones have appeared in the past year or so, but the vogue is passing away and they have achieved but little popularity, and I doubt if they are well enough to have any suggestive value to the average audience. A strain of "Idaho" or "San Antonio" or any other of the well known songs of that kind will suggest to the observer that he is looking at a cow-boy. This, of course, when you want to introduce "local color" in your scene. For the rest of your picture the music must depend upon what the cow-boy or cow-boys are doing. Are they fighting, dancing, making love or lynching somebody? These situations would be described the same as if they were being enacted by any characters other than cow-boys. They are melodramatic and require melodramatic music. I am a great admirer of "local color" in picture music, but it must not be overdone. Because your scene is laid in the West among cowboys is no reason why your music should all be suggestive of that character. Work up the picture the same as if it were laid in another locality, and throw in a "cow-boy" tune once in a while so as to keep the atmosphere, and that is about all you can do.

I can appreciate the perplexity of the conscientious player in regard to this particular kind of picture. We have music peculiar to almost every part of the world and the inhabitants thereof, but with the exceptions of the class of tunes I have mentioned, there is absolutely nothing which the average person can associate with the Western States. It is true the ranchmen had their songs, but these were words of their own making set to tunes brought from their homes "back East," and would have no meaning when played to the audience of the present day. With other pictures the case is different. In a Mexican picture, for example, you can work up scenes of greatly varied character, and yet preserve your local atmosphere if you wish to do so. Mexican and Spanish music (they are similar) abounds in sharp contrasts and whether the airs be joyous, sentimental or sorrowful, the racial character is ever present. (N. B.—Please leave the castinets out of the pathetic scenes.)

Indian pictures. Genuine American Indian songs are, with few exceptions of little value as instrumental numbers, especially for the piano. There are characteristic "Indian" numbers, however, written by modern composers which have come to be recognized as Indian music. "The Sun Dance," Herbert's "Indian Dance" (from "It Happened in Nordland"—both published by Witmark & Sons); "Indian War Dance" (published by John Church & Co.); one movement in "Trailing the Trail" (published by Will Rossiter) are among numbers of this kind and as they are effective on the piano are better than real Indian music for picture work. Where Indians predominate in the picture, use as much of this music as you can (for the Indian scenes) and the balance of the picture the same as any melodrama. It depends altogether on the nature of the scenes. These pictures also are usually melodramas. As to courtroom scenes, bar-room scenes, etc., I cannot understand why they should require a particular kind of music. It must depend upon what is taking place in these rooms. There are court room scenes which are pathetic throughout, while others are better described by a half-mysterious accompaniment. A humorous courtroom scene will, of course, be classed with the comedies and treated accordingly, i. e., lively or burlesque music or the ever popular song chorus (when it can be made suggestive of the scene.) As to the other two scenes mentioned, the same answer will apply. It is not practical to find music descriptive of every locality in which your picture may be laid. Important geographical places or those well enough known to your audience for their music to be recognized may often furnish a legitimate excuse for working a bit of "local color" in your scene—usually to its advantage. Also many of the characters (when prominent) can sometimes afford the same opportunity. A Confederate solider would suggest "Dixie," a comedy farmer "Ruben, Ruben," or one of the many "Barn dances." College songs, plantation songs, national songs of Europe and other countries, with the tunes descriptive of Indian, Chinese, Mexican and other characters will furnish much to relieve the monotony of your musical program during the neutral songs, and when anything "is doing" in the dramatic order, work up the scene as you would any other dramatic scene regardless of the character or locality —unless you happen to have something particularly fitted for some particular scene. For example, you might have to describe a pathetic situation which occurs in the Southern States or some one of the European countries; in this case one of the plaintive songs of that locality would be infinitely better than an ordinary "plaintive."

Some time ago I answered an inquiry regarding the use of "patriotic" music. The writer said in substance: "We shall have patriotic pictures on a certain day. Should I play nothing but patriotic music for such? My answer was in line with what I have just said regarding other pictures. Play patriotic music for such scenes only as demand it. In the heavy battle scenes (if there be such) play heavy "hurries." In the death scenes (if any) use pathetic music. Save your "fred-fire" and flag music for the most effective parts and see if you don't get more satisfactory results. I saw a good civil war drama some time ago and the accompanying music was patriotic throughout. The "Star Spangled Banner" waved through all the battle scenes regardless of which side was getting the best of it. "Hail Columbia" served to depict the death of the hero. It was much better than playing waltzes of course, but had the pianist reserved some of her "Star Spangled Banner" for the big climaxes, I believe—from the way the audience was "keyed up," she could have brought them to their feet. And it seemed to me that "The Vacant Chair" would have been more fitting music for the dead soldier. It is equally applicable to the North or South, though we can often use "Massa's in the Cold Ground" for the latter. Others of a plaintive nature are "Just Before the Battle Mother," and "Tenting on the Old Camp Ground," both contemporary with the Civil War. I can see no reason however, why they should not be appropriate to any war picture. Speak of war pictures and patriotic pictures as if they were one and the same. The one so often includes the other that generally speaking the above suggestions will apply. While on this subject, I wonder why so few seem to understand the value—in fact, the necessity— of the sound effect for gunshots. A battle scene is so empty without these effects—or to put it another way—the value of the picture is increased so much by the addition of these sounds, that I cannot understand how any manager will consent to show a picture without them. Most drummers know, or should know how to produce the sound of shots either single or in volleys, on the small drum. Where no drums are employed the old stage expedient of striking a buggy cushion sharply with a whip will be found effective. Or two small canes or rattans, one held in each hand may, by striking alternately, give a perfect imitation of a volley of musketry. Many other pictures beside war pictures call for a gun or pistol shot. None of them need be loud, but it seems to me that so long as they are seen they might as well be heard and when they are heard they add to the dramatic effect of your picture.

Carl Fischer has issued a set of books for orchestra containing a good selection of national airs of many countries. They are "band-book" size, arranged by Theo. Moses-Tobani, and the piano part can be used alone as it contains all the melody.

Scene from "The King's Favorite"—Coming Thanhouser Release.

Boston.

Mr. Frank Howard, sometime proprietor of the big Licensed film exchange in Boston, but now traveler and pleasure seeker, dropped into Boston after an extended absence of several months spent in travels, accompanied by Mrs. Howard, over most parts of this country.

It is somewhat unusual for moving picture theaters to run "special releases," as they are not everyday happenings; but to see a theater running two specials on the same bill is somewhat in the nature of an event. Manager Appleby, of the Star Theater, Tremont Row, accomplished this when he exhibited "Count Leo Tolstoi," à Pathe, a special release, and the "Bangor, Maine, Fire," also a Pathe special, on the same bill. Manager Appleby says that "they come high, but the warm weather needs a little extra inducement." This is what might be termed "plunging" on the part of the Star, but it is also progressive.

The Realistic Moving Picture Company, Joseph L. Roth, general manager, has given up its Jolliette Theater and is now operating only the Olympic Theater. Due to the fact that there was difficulty in the renewal of the lease, which would have expired October 1, 1911, the company decided to give the house up immediately. The Jolliette is now being operated by the owners of the property. No changes have been made at this writing, and W. E. Greene's Independent service and illustrated songs still prevail. It is not often that a theater changes hands without many drastic changes in policy being made. Therefore, it is a compliment to Manager Roth that the new owners thought his ideas on the running of the Jolliette could not be much improved upon. Mr. Roth is now giving his undivided attention to the Olympic Theater, Bowdoin Square. HENRY.

THE FORGED DISPATCH (IMP).

Of the forthcoming Imp releases none is more notable than the military drama, "The Forged Dispatch," a film intended to add interest to Memorial Day services. It is for release May 22nd, in plenty of time for the early run service in the theaters. "The Forged Dispatch" is one of the very best war stories ever filmed, and in addition to having the spirit of the conflict, a touching love story is incorporated which action opens in the first scene and closes at the finale. It is a story of jealousy, of the revenge of the disappointed suitor by causing the humiliation of the hero. The wrong is righted on Memorial Day when the survivors of the war are marching to the cemetery to pay their annual respects to their departed comrades. The finding of the forged order in the blouse of a soldier brother, who died at the front, the joy of the sweetheart who has awaited many years for the vindication of her soldier-lover, and the reversal of sentiment all combine to make it a touching story which closes with a grievous wrong righted to the satisfaction of any audience. The drama is elaborately staged, with a large cast, and appropriate costuming, and will go down in film history as one of the best efforts of the Imp company.

ESSANAY TO FILM AUTO RACES.

The Essanay Film Manufacturing Co. have arranged for the exclusive motion picture rights of the International Auto Races at Indianapolis on Decoration Day. This meet on the greatest speedway of the world should furnish material for a very exciting reel of pictures which will be released as a special on the day following the event.

NEW FILM RENOVATING COMPANY.

From the American National Film Co., 3 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass., we have received a sample of their renovating work. Part of the film is left in the original condition, showing the scratches and dirt usually seen on a film that has had long use. In the renovated portion the scratches are not visible and a pleasing tint further improves the appearance. At $2 a reel we imagine that the exchanges will keep this concern busy putting their reels in order.

HUDSON MOVING PICTURE COMPANY.

The Hudson Moving Picture Company has recently been established in Hoboken, N. J. Mr. John W. Mitchell, well known in film circles, is general manager and superintendent of the plant. Mr. Mitchell was formerly connected with the Cameraphone and Edison companies in the capacities of director, cameraman and in other ways. It is the intention of the Hudson Moving Picture Company to produce one regular release per week of comedy and drama, which will be supplemented from time to time with a reel of educational or industrial pictures. Their present address is 556 Ferry Street, Hoboken, N. J.

MISLEADING POSTERS.

May 13th, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir: I would like space in your paper to express my opinion about the lithographed posters sent out with the films by both Independent and Licensed manufacturers. The parties who get up these posters surely cannot be furnished with a photograph from any of the scenes, or when they do show a picture from the film, it is certainly with very poor taste, as to what will draw the public. The Imp release, "Second Sight," had one of the worst selected posters I have ever seen, in fact it acted as a knock to the picture. The sooner the manufactures will adopt a plain half sheet poster, or banner, with the name of the film cast of the characters and a half-tone photograph with one of the scenes with a short descraption, the better it will be for all concerned.

Yours very truly,

Sandusky, Ohio. CHARLES KEARK.

OFFICER, THEY'RE OUT AGAIN!

YES, THEY COME OUT WEEKLY ON REXDAY, THURSDAY.

QUESTIONS ON LAST WEEK'S LESSONS.

1. Tell in your own words why an image is produced by a "pin hole" camera.
2. What affects the size of the image?
3. Why does the image appear in natural colors?
4. How does the pinhole camera prove the rectilinear propagation of light?
5. What is the umbra?
6. What is the penumbra?
7. Explain why there is a penumbra to a shadow and under what conditions it is present.
8. Where will the umbra be in the form of a cone?
9. Is the penumbra denser near the umbra than at its outer edge and why?
10. Under what condition is there no penumbra?

In Fig. 8 we see a source of light A, from which rays eminate in every direction. This is precisely what takes place in every source of light unless a portion of the rays are in some manner diverted or a portion are obstructed as by means of reflectors or an opaque object

By this diagram it is readily seen that as the light rays proceed away from the source in straight lines they diverge or spread apart. This explains why illumination decreases rapidly as one moves away from an open light. The rule is that the illuminating power of an open light decreases in inverse proportion to the square of the distance. This rule is readily susceptible of proof as to its accuracy. Set a candle in a box such as is shown in Fig. 7, except that hole in end of box should be square, one inch each way (any other size would do, but one inch is convenient) and be pierced through some thin substance such as cardboard or tin. For the experiment a larger hole may be cut in the wood and the paper or metal with hole tacked or pasted over it. The experiment will be made much better if a metal square with hole ¼ inch in diameter also be placed between the candle and hole, quite close to the flame, to reduce the light to approximately a point.

Now place the box on a table, place the candle-flame at same height as opening and ten inches from the hole. Next measure off and mark on the table, straight in front of the hole, two distances ten and twenty inches respectively from the hole or twenty and thirty inches from the candle. Set a screen at the first mark and it will be found that the spot of light will measure just twice the size of the hole, or two by two inches. Remove the screen to the second mark, 30 inches from the candle, and the light-spot will measure just three times the size of the hole, or three inches square. This conclusively proves that light rays travel in straight lines; also that, with the source a given distance from the opening, the diameter of the spot will be proportional to its distance from the source. It will be noted that in the first instance the area of the spot was 2 x 2, or 4 square inches. In the second experiment it was 3 x 3, or 9 square inches. Let us next examine into just what effect this will have on illumination. Let us suppose the smaller square opening to be of a given number of square inches in area represented by X. We will again place the screen containing the aperture ten inches from source of light, and beyond it ten inches (twenty inches from source of light) we place a screen to receive the rays passing through opening. The size of the patch of light on the screen will be, as we have already seen, twice the size of the opening or its area will be 4 square inches, or four times the area of the light aperture. Now, while as a matter of fact, there are hundreds of thousands of rays passing through the aperature, let us assume that just one hundred rays pass through and fall on the screen. The square of light is, as we have seen, four square in ches in area. This would allot twenty-five rays to the square inch of screen. In other words, our illumination or curtain brilliancy would be that brilliancy produced by 25 rays falling on one square inch of surface.

To have a symbol let us assume this brilliancy to be represented by 100. Now we will move the screen back 10 inches further from the aperture and, as before shown, we find the patch of light has increased to 3 x 3 inches, or an area of 9 square inches. In the previous experiment the area is 2 x 2, or 4 square inches, whereas we now have nine. In the first experiment we had our 100 rays divided between 4 square inches, or 25 rays to the square inch. We now have the hundred rays divided, or spread over the surface of 9 square inches, which means only 11 1-9 rays to the square inch instead of 25. In other words, we have a little more than doubled the curtain area and a little more than halved the curtain brilliancy, though still using the same total light strength. Let us here note that whereas we get a certain increase in size of the curtain spot when we move the screen back, this increase would vary as the source of light be moved closer to or further away from the aperture. If the source be close to the aperture the angle will be wide and the size of the light spot will increase rapidly as the screen is moved back. If the source be far away from the aperture the opposite will be found to be true. This same is analagous, as will be later shown, to long and short focal length objective lenses.

The same idea may be well expressed as per Fig. 9, in which we see light rays traveling in every direction from a source. If screen A be placed successively at B and C, it will be readily seen that there will be a wide difference in the number of rays striking its surface; hence a dimunition of illumination as it is removed from A to B and from B to C.

The measuring of light is accomplished by several methods, all amounting to the same thing in the end, viz.: a comparison of the light with a standard. These methods are, without exception so far as the writer knows, based on the law of the inverse square.

In photometry two sources of light are made to illuminate adjacent sections of a screen, the distance of the respective sources from the screen being so gauged that the illumination is equal. Suppose we have two sources of light, the strength or illuminating power of which is represented by the symbol X and X'. Now suppose we let the symbol A and A' stand for the distance of the sources from the screen. In this case the screen illumination of the first would be X divided by the square of A and the screen illumination or light intensity of the second would be X' divided by the square of A'. Now if the power of both sources be equal then we would have $\frac{X}{A^2}$ equals $\frac{X'}{A'^2}$ or $\frac{X}{X'}$ equals $\frac{A^2}{A'^2}$. From this it is seen that the illuminating power of two sources of light are proportional to the squares of the distances at which they produce like results on the screen, or produce equal intensity of illumination.

Candle Power.—In light measurement it immediately becomes necessary that there be established some accepted standard of illuminating power and that this standard be in terms in which the power of other sources of light may be expressed. For this purpose the standard candle has been and is now ordinarily in use, though it is not an altogether satisfactory standard.

The Standard Candle is of sperm, weighs six to the pound and burns at the rate of 120 grains of wax per hour. Other sources of light, such as the electric arc, incandescent globes, gas flame, etc., may be and are compared to the standard candle, their power being measured, or expressed in the number of standard candles required to produce an equal illumination.

Oily Film.—Mansfield, Mass., writes: "I received the Handbook purchased a short time ago and am well pleased with it. Every operator should have one running a Motiograph and like it very much, but am having considerable trouble with oil on film. I wipe all the oil off the machine before I start, but it doesn't seem to make any difference. I believe the most of it is on the film when it comes from the exchange, since when I draw the film through my fingers for a few feet they are all covered with oil and dust. Would it do any harm to have a piece of felt or chamois fitted in the magazine where the film comes out, and would it clean any of the oil and dirt off? Or would it do the film harm?"

The Geneva of the Motiograph runs in an oil tight casing and unless you oil the other bearings to excess there is no danger of oil being thrown on the film by the Motiograph mechanism. In this connection, however, you must remember that one drop of oil is ample for any bearing of any moving picture machine, while two drops is just one drop too many and will, as I have before pointed out, merely be thrown off and cause a dirty mess. Not long since one of the correspondents of the department suggested what seems to me a good scheme for oiling, namely, get a coarse darning needle, break the head off at the top of the eye, leaving the two sides of the eye intact. By dipping that sort of an instrument in oil you will pick up just one drop and it may be placed in the bearing exactly where you want it. It struck me as an ideal scheme for oiling a moving picture machine. No, it wouldn't do to put felt in the magazine for traps, since there would always be the danger of bad patches catching and tearing the film in two. The little film cleaning device, advertised in our columns, is, however, excellent; it removes the oil and dust and is a practical machine, low in cost, and really does considerable good in improving the appearance of the picture through removal of dirt, dust and oil from the film.

Jones Pictures Make Good.—Mr. L. E. Hammond under date of May 7th writes from Cincinnati as follows: "We showed Buffalo Jones' pictures and lectures by himself to over 2000 people at 25 and 50 cents admission in this hall, in Dayton, Ohio, last Friday night."

Friend Hammond writes on a post card, the opposite side of which shows an excellent picture of Memorial Hall, Dayton, Ohio. "Two thousand people at 25 and 50 cents in one night sounds like good old times, when 100 feet of film packed an opera house at 25, 50 and 75 cents, and packed it two or three times a night at that. With a record of this kind must certainly the "Buffalo Jones" pictures can be said to have made good.

Shutter Reflection.—Mr. G. T. Howard, Tucson, Ariz., writes: "The Handbook received and contents carefully read. It is my opinion that if operators, manager, exchanges and even manufacturers would follow the rules therein set forth, the moving picture business would be in a much better condition. In a recent issue of the 'World' you invite discussion on the matter of arc reflecting on outside shutter. I am running a Powers No. 6 outside shutter, instant picture; D. C. through mercury arc rectifier. My shutter is ¾ inch from the front rim of the objective lens. When machine is running there is a very good image of the crater formed on the shutter. The spot of light is round and inside the circle there is an outline of the aperture, though not very plain. Within this outline there is an oval spot of light which is an image of the crater. The tip of my lower carbon only shows when I freeze the carbons. It can be seen much plainer with some films than with others. You say there must be something wrong, but I cannot see that I am losing any light. My picture is clear, steady and bright. We claim to lead the Southwest in the matter of projection and many travelers say that we certainly do. I have been in the business five years and have never yet seen projection superior to that we produce here in the Clifton Theater. Have everything supplied that an operator could ask for in the way of equipment. That, together with careful work, is my receipt for good projection. I would like to ask you why it is my back condensing lens turns purple in a week or so. My remedy for condenser breakage is to put the front lens in the place of the back one when it breaks and put the new lens in the front, since it is already tempered. Considerable has been said of late through the department as regards the matter of arc setting. I believe that I have tried every conceivable set that one could possibly get. When I first tried your way of setting I could not hold my light and was inclined to think you were mistaken. I kept at it, however, watching every little thing, and found that it was these little things that counted. I am now satisfied that you are correct and that anybody who tries your way just once or twice and says you are wrong had better stick to it awhile and learn how to use the set. The enclosed program will give you an idea of our show."

So far as the arc reflection on the shutter is concerned, Friend Howard, I believe you have by this time read my further explanation of the matter and need not say anything further on that point. The reason for your condensers turning purple is too much of a certain ingredient contained in the glass. I understand this ingredient to be lead. Such condensers should be returned to the seller as they are of no account. The lead lies with the manufacturers, who should by all means be obliged to make them good. You have struck the nail on the head in the matter of carbon set. The man who tries to set carbons on A. C. the way I set them will have to study the small points and to learn to have everything just exactly right. I have, however, discussed this matter before and beyond saying that you are perfectly right, at this time of the year, I do not care to discuss the matter. Your program shows a very excellent show. Also the make-up of the program shows distinct enterprise on the part of the management. I was amused at the line reading "Airdome opening postponed until warmer nights." The only time I was in Tucson (September, 1902), I think cast iron stoves had been placed in the middle of the aisles in the theaters about fifteen minutes. I really did not think it ever got cloudy enough there to make an open air performance uncomfortable.

Faulty Focus.—Mr. Rae Peacock, Stafford, Kan., writes: "My picture will be in perfect focus except in one corner and when I get that corner in focus the other part is out. It is impossible to get the whole picture in focus at the same time. What can be the trouble?"

Well, Neighbor Peacock, if the thing is exactly as you have stated, the probabilities are that you have a worn aperture plate or an aperture plate on which the tracks are not true, that is, your tension spring is bulging over the track or would suggest that you see to it that your aperture plate tracks are in good shape and that your tension springs set square on the tracks and straight up and down. If that doesn't change it, then take out your projection lens and sprinkle a little powdered chalk on the face of the front lens, put it back in, turn on the light, but keep the carbons frozen, so that you can look in through the lens. You will by reason of the chalk be able to see sharp and distinct images of the aperture plate on the front lens. If it does not appear in the center of the lens, then your lens tube is not adjusted so with the aperture and that is probably about your difficulty, as provided it does not lie in the aperture plate or tension springs. Any of our readers who have had similar difficulty and have further suggestions to offer will kindly communicate with the department. We will be glad to hear from them.

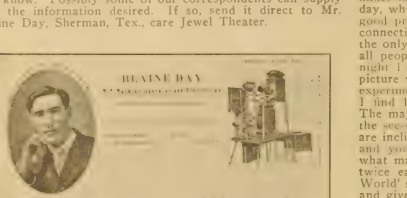
A Suggestion.—Mr. John Blohm, Chesley, Ont., writes: "I note in the 'Show World' an article entitled 'Pass It Along,' in which it is suggested that we lend the 'World' to local newspapers, etc., to the end that they publish excerpts for the education of the people. Now, I believe we of the moving picture business are all getting our knocks from narrow-minded people. The lending out scheme is not very feasible, since in many places there are only one or two new papers and in many instances the editor is a Methodist Sunday-school teacher, for instance (that's about as bad as it could be), I would suggest that we ourselves start a war of education and teach the public to see pictures. The 'World' no doubt has on its staff writers capable of getting out small booklets explaining all about moving pictures and everything pertaining thereto. Such booklets printed by the thousands, or even by the millions, would not prove expensive enough, but that every exhibitor in the States and Canada could mail them out, or give them away at the box office. They would be bound to do a lot of good and very likely create considerable new business. I would like very much to hear from other exhibitors on this point, especially those who have been through the mill. I would like also to know what the cost of such booklet would be."

Well, Neighbor Blohm, ideas of this kind are entirely practical always, provided enough exhibitors would agree to take sufficient books from week to week or from month to month to allow of large quantities being printed. No doubt such booklets rightly handled would do a great deal of good. Personally, however, I am not very enthusiastic over such schemes. My way of boo-sting moving pictures is by means of carefully selected programs, the very best service one can afford, the highest possible grade of projection and carefully, intelligent management of the house. Mind you, I do not mean to say that those books would not do a lot of good—by no manner of means. On the contrary, they unquestionably would accomplish a very considerable benefit. IF, IF, IF—and that is right where the trouble comes in. If anybody would get them out; if a sufficient number of exhibitors or managers would buy them, so that anyone could get them out; if they were carefully and intelligently distributed by the man who bought them. As a whole, however, I would consider the scheme, under present conditions, as impractical. I would be glad, however, to publish the views of any exhibitors who wish to take the matter up.

Address Wanted.—Mr. Blaine Day, Sherman, Tex., writes: "Will you kindly give me the address of the manufacturer of the OPTO-C condensers? The name OPTO-C is stamped on the lens. And now, just a word of praise for the Handbook. I bought one November 25, 1910, and am more than pleased with it. If there had been a book like that in 1905 and 1906 we would have gotten along much better. I still have one of the little operators' Handbooks you put out in 1907 and intend to keep it as a souvenir of bygone days. What a wonderful improvement there has been in four short years."

No, Neighbor Day, I am sorry to say, I cannot supply you the name of the manufacturers of the OPTO-C lens. I telephoned several lens men here in New York and they did not know. Possibly some of our correspondents can supply you the information desired. If so, send it direct to Mr. Blaine Day, Sherman, Tex., care Jewel Theater.



Above I show the picture of Mr. Day's letterhead for the reason that it is the best of the kind I have seen to date. "Make sure you have the right man at the machine" is quite suggestive and eminently correct. "Absolutely a clear field and a bright picture" is good. "My work guaranteed. Reference next in America, if requested," is a monumental claim, but I have no doubt it is one which Friend Day can make good.

Operators' National Union.—San Diego, Cal., asks: "Can you tell me if there is a National organization of moving picture machine operators? If so, kindly give me the names of the president and secretary. Enclosed find stamp for answer."

Again I must remind you that I do not answer letters personally. The demands of my time are too great. No, there is no national organization of operators. The operators' unions, of which there are many, are affiliated with the National Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees. I do not at the moment remember the name or the location of the officers of that organization. I would suggest you write to Mr. W. C. Woods, President Moving Picture and Projecting Machine Operators' Union, Auxiliary to Local No. 162, I. A. T. S. E., 68 Haight Street, San Francisco, who will, I believe, furnish you with the desired information.

Boston Wants the "World."—Boston, Mass., writes: "Have you anybody in this city that keeps the 'Moving Picture World' on hand?"

You will find the "World" on sale at any of the Boston news stands that are supplied by the New England News Company. Why not send in a subscription and receive it regularly?

Flickers.—Ft. Worth, Tex., writes: "I have two Type B Edison, 1910 model, machines and a throw of 97 feet. My lenses are special No. 3, star and intermittent, are set perfectly true. The shutter is set as near as possible to both frames. Running the machine 75 to 80, I have a steady picture, but some flicker. Running at 85 helps the flicker some, but this is offset by the jumping of the picture. I use 50 to 55 amperes D. C. Now, the question I would like to ask is: Is it possible to put a perfectly flickerless picture on the curtain with this or any other machine with a white or water background, with a 97-foot throw?"

Yes, it is entirely practical to put an absolutely flickerless picture on any kind of a screen, but, at normal speed, it is neither possible or practical with a two-wing shutter, or at least, I have never seen it done. To get a flickerless picture you must have a tree-wing shutter, or something which produces the same effect. The throw has nothing to do with the flicker, though the flicker reduces, to some extent, as the size of the picture is increased. I have seen a flickerless picture at normal speed with a two-wing shutter, but it was an outside shutter with the two wings exactly the same size. I have never yet seen a flickerless picture with an ordinarily light film and a two-wing shutter running at normal speed. With nine-cenths of the subjects the effect would be practically ruined running at eighty feet a minute. My advice is that you equip your machine with a three-wing outside shutter, following plans which have often been set forth from time to time in this department by the operators who have themselves changed their machines, installing outside shutters.

Daily Program Changes.—Mr. F. L. Andrews, Dickson, Tenn., writes: "I purchased the Handbook a few weeks ago and consider it the best instruction book I have ever seen. You certainly have delivered the goods. It is what I would call the making of an operator or manager, because it explains things in such plain language that one cannot help understanding it. Now as to changing the program every day, which I see (page 166, Handbook) you do not consider good practice. I would like to give my experience in this connection: I used to believe that changing every day was the only way, especially in a small town. My idea was that all people who would patronize the show would come the night I changed pictures and the second night on the same picture would, I believed, be a dead one. Well, I made the experiment of changing three times a week and my business I find has been much better than with the daily change. The majority of my programs draw much larger crowds on the second nights than on the first, and I find the exchanges are inclined to give better service. Also the expense is less, and you know that good service and a good operator is what makes the money drawer fill up. I advertise once or twice each week and there is where the 'Moving Picture World' shines, since I always look for the stories of my reels and give the people a pretty good idea of what I am going to show. I have found this plan to be a very great advantage."

We are glad you like the Handbook. Judging by letters at hand, there are about two thousand others of the same mind. We indeed glad that the book made good, even though it is not all I could have wished it to be. Your ideas and mine are exactly the same in the matter of film service. I do not believe in changing every night, and never did believe in it. I am convinced it is nonsense, notwithstanding the fact that the great majority of managers will, I am well aware, disagree with me. I think, however, if they made the experiment of changing to the three-times-a-week service they would be converted, provided they pay the exchange the same amount of money, thus securing a better class of service. Even at that, they would save on express charges, have less bother, and would, I believe, do a better business.

Expert Repair Man Wanted.—Portland, Ore., writes: "Do you know of any first class motion picture machine repair man whom we could engage to work for us? He must be an expert man and understand the business thoroughly."

No, Portland, I do not know of such a man whom you could secure. Really expert repair men, who are acquainted with all the different makes of machines, are about as plentiful as the proverbial hen's teeth. Anyone who feels he can fill the bill is at liberty to send in his name and I will forward his letter to the party in Portland immediately on receipt.

Side Throw.—Oklahoma (name of town suppressed) writes: "I am thinking of putting in a gallery. Our building is 26 feet wide. Will it spoil one side of the picture if I should move the operating room to the extreme side? Is there any way to overcome this trouble if it appears? I have hopes of visiting New York City this summer, since the Shriners meet in Rochester, and you know I will never get that close to the 'World' without paying you a visit."

You have left out one very important point, Oklahoma, and that is the length of the throw. If you have a long throw, say 80 feet or more, and are not throwing a picture greater than, say 16 feet, the distortion would probably not be very noticeable, though of course one side would be a little higher from top to bottom than the other. It is very likely that with the ordinary quarter size objective lens you might have some trouble with your focus. However, I believe this can be overcome by the installation of a half size projection lens, which same you can procure of the Gundsch-Manhattan Company, or through the Nicholas Power Company, New York. If your throw is a short one the angle will, of course, be corresponding greater, and if it is such less than 80 feet I do not believe I would try it, though you might get away with it all right. I would suggest you set your machine temporarily over the one side some morning, or some night after a show, project a picture and see what you get out of it. However, if you will send me the length of the throw and the size of the picture, together with the width of the house, I can give you more definite information.

Short Throw. Mansfield, Ohio, writes: "I am building my operating room back of the screen. It will only be 20 feet from the operating room to the curtain. I would like to project a picture 12 feet wide. Kindly tell me where I can get suitable lenses; also what in your opinion would be a good curtain?"

You will find projecting a picture 12 feet wide at 20 feet to be an exceedingly difficult proposition, Mansfield, and one that I think you will be obliged in the end to pass up. The Gundlach Manhattan Company or the Bausch & Lomb people, both of Rochester, N. Y., can supply you with the lenses to anyone can. But lenses for such projection with anything less than 2 inches equivalent focus lenses is hardly practical. The Mirror Screen people, whose advertisement you will find in these columns from time to time, supply a ground glass screen which is par excellence, but of course, comparatively costly. To set behind the curtain is necessary that you have some screen which will diffuse the light, otherwise you will have to set your machine below the curtain and shoot upward or set it up and shoot down at a pretty heavy angle, else the bright spot of light from the lens will be visible to the audience.

Has Trouble.—Alabama (name of city suppressed by request) writes: "Enclosed find check for $1.50 for the Handbook. I am at the present time operating a theater on this city as a moving picture house, with all the attendant difficulties of only fair projection. We have a Powers No. 6 with compensator, throwing 60 feet, with a drop of about 18 feet. The picture is approximately 18 feet wide. We have a white surface curtain; use 24 Electric soft cored carbons, 9 and bottom, 60 amperes A. C. continuously and two 6½ condensing lenses. I am, however, reportedly told that my picture is not so bright as that of a competing house where the throw is practically the same and the size of the picture only a few feet less. The competing house uses an Alabastine curtain. It is admitted, however, that we have less flicker and that our definition is much good. It is necessary that my picture be even brighter than the other before the operation for darkness will leave the house. Quite naturally I do not wish to blindly experiment theirefore any suggestions you may make will be duly appreciated. I find a great deal of valuable information in the department and though I have received quite a good technical education from one of the leading schools of the South, I find myself amazed at its intricate details an operator is obliged to deal with.

I think, Alabama, you named about two tithe of the difficulty when you said the competing house had a picture a few feet less in size. Also it is possible that they are using a machine the shutter of which cuts a little less light. You must remember that you are putting a certain given quantity of light through the aperture of your machine, a certain given percentage of which is cut off, or eliminated by the revolving shutter; what remains is your total available light. However, your picture being 18 feet wide it will cover a space of approximately 234 square feet, over which your available light is diffused or distributed. Now, supposing your competitor's picture to be only 15 feet wide, it would only cover approximately 165 square feet of surface, or 69 feet less than yours. This would mean that, assuming that he is using the same light strength you are, his picture would naturally be almost one-third brighter, since he is confining his light to approximately one-third less space. Do you see the point? On the other hand, however, you are using the silvered curtain, which ought to almost, if not entirely, make up the difference. Study the pages of the Handbook devoted to carbon setting carefully and I think your operator may possibly be able to improve his light by so doing. You may increase the amount of light also by having the Nicholas Power Company send you a two-wing shutter for your machine. You will, however, get considerably more flicker with that shutter than with the three-wing article. As to the curtain matter, I have directed the parties you referred to to send you literature concerning their screen. After studying the Handbook and what I have here said to you regarding the size of your picture, you are still unable to solve your difficulty, I will be glad to take the matter up further with you at a later date. Look carefully at this week's lesson on light.

Light Plant.—Frohma, Mo., writes: "Do you know which of the two electric plants advertised in your columns is the better? I would be glad if you would give me the advantage of your knowledge. One moving picture machine company told me that they made inquiries regarding small electric plants and have been informed that they cannot be depended on to give reliable service. They referred me to one manufacturer, but his outfit is too expensive and heavy to suit me. If you know anything for or against any of the above electric plants I wish you would kindly advise me."

I think, Frohma, you certainly must realize that it is not within the province of this department to draw comparisons between the goods of different manufacturers. Such a course however useful it might be, would be entirely impractical from several points of view. It is however a fact that these small light plants have to be intelligently handled, and they might not be a success in the hands of every one who happened to get hold of them. There is ample evidence, however, that in the hands of men who take intelligent care of them they do, and are delivering the goods. I would suggest in this connection that you write to Mr. C. L. Bagley, 245 Main Street, Buffalo, N. Y., an operator who has had considerable experience with small light plants. There are quite a number of live correspondents who are using small isolated plants who could give valuable information. I would suggest that those subscribers write immediately to the concerns, another, Mr. W. B. Case, Frohma, Mo., who is giving him some information concerning their experience and their plant as they think will be of value and assistance to him.

A Question. Boston, Mass., writes: "A certain operator claims that he can operate a moving picture machine on steam pipes from the top balcony of a theater and get as good clear-cut pictures as if the machine were on a level with the screen. He says the figures in the picture will show every bit as distinctly when thrown from the top balcony as on a level. Is this correct? Is it necessary to use special lens or tools are necessary to do the trick. How do you think it could be done? Will you kindly give me the names of the different manufacturers who are now furnished or non-inflammable films and do they use any of the inflammable stock? Can you tell me where I can get a positive pole finger at a reasonable price?"

The statement of the operator if only correct as it was. When he says he can get as good a clear picture as when the wing on a level with the screen, he is not correct. Of course the picture will be larger in proportion to the width across throwing from a top balcony and having an acute angle to the screen, but the picture also will be wider, the rays will be, to some extent, distorted. Personally, I notice the keystone shape in the picture smeared up, if the pitch is very heavy. The error is done by substituting an aperture plate used so that it is narrower at the top than at the bottom, just enough to get to make up for the spreading of the picture on the screen. Apertures would have to be cut for each individual house. It is reported that there will be an early non-inflammable film used after the first of next month. Any first class electrical supply house can tell you as to the matter of a pole tinder, I suppose. I would suggest having your local electric supply house give or get you prices, descriptive matter, etc.

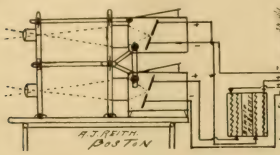
Wiring Diagram.—Mr. A. J. Reith, Boston, sends in the following: "I herewith hand you sketch of the manner in which I have connected up my dissolving stereopticon. The wiring has given satisfactory results throughout a year of service. The rheostat is a 12 coil, 25 ampere instrument. I have split it so as to make two circuits. The advantage is the saving of a rheostat. I find there is not enough heat produced to harm the rheostat and in case of trouble it means one less rheostat to examine. I am using 45 amperes 10 c. p. on my pictures, which are 16 feet wide. An operator I know to have been in the business long before I was made a statement to the effect that he could see no sense in using that amount of current when he could take a single rheostat and a Powers No. 5 and get better pictures than I could with two rheostats and a No. 6, any size picture. Is he right?"



I do not exactly understand what you have done, Friend Reith. If you have 25 ampere, 110 volt rheostat and you have split it up, that is to say, hitched half the coils on one stereo lamp and half on the other, then you would have an exceedingly heavy current on your stereo. Moreover, the coil ought to get very red. In fact, I should not think such an arrangement would work at all satisfactorily. If, on the other hand, you are using a 220-volt rheostat on 110, then your scheme would work out OK. Your information concerning the rheostat is not sufficiently comprehensive to allow us to judge of the merits of your scheme. As to the proposition set forth by the old operator, he is, in my judgment, not correct. In the first place, while the Powers No. 5 gives a greater percentage of light than does the No. 6 when equipped with the three-wing shutter, it does not give anywhere near as good a picture, for the very simple reason that with the two-wing inside shutter, except at high speed, you have more or less of the objectionable flicker, which is entirely obviated with the No. 6. Again: when the gentleman says he can produce such results regardless of the size of the picture he is simply making statements which he cannot back up with performance.

Watching Carbons.—Greenville, Pa., writes: "To watch carbon points, place the points together and make a mark on the inside of the lamp house wall exactly opposite to them, then punch a hole the size of a pin in the wall at that point. Through this hole an image of the carbon points will be projected on the wall of the operating booth."

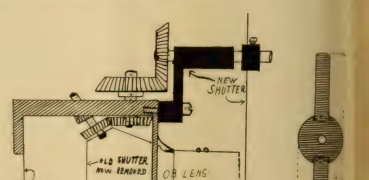
This scheme has already been published several times. It is all right where the machine sets next to the wall, and not far away from it. The image, however, will be improved by inserting in front of the hole, outside of the lamp house, at the right distance away, a piece of condenser lens. Cut out that "booth" please. Operating ROOM is the word. As long as you talk "booth," you are likely to get a "booth."

Notes from Dixieland.—Savannah, Ga., writes: "There was only a fair sized audience at the Folly Theater, Friday evening. Three reels were shown. The first reel started in out of frame and the light was so bad your scribe could not make out the title. The other two reels started off a little better, but the light was very badly handled and the pictures were out of focus on one side. The Pathe Western drama would have shown up beautifully if it had been rightly projected. The sides of the spot light were heavily tinged with brown and the light was almost anything but white. The orchestra was a treat. Two Powers No. 6 machines are in the operating room. The Odeon Theater, opposite the Folly, was crowded. Three reels of film were shown, the first being an Urban Eclipse! 'The Old Mill.' The way this picture was handled was a credit to the operator and all concerned. The light was fine and not one time throughout the length of the film was there a single flaw in the projection. The picture was steady and the speed well gauged. In the second reel, however, an Essanay comedy, the light was good, but poorly handled, a constant jamming of the carbons together seemed to be the operator's long suit, which only served to spoil his picture. The third reel, an old Vitagraph, was very well shown, the light good and well handled. Song slides were dirty, the corners dark, and they were very poorly handled."

The editor of this Department would like to call attention to one thing in connection with the above letter. Evidently at least in one of the houses, there was a competent operator; that is to say, at least, a man who "knew how." Little did he dream when he became careless, and probably tried to knock a tit off of his carbon by jamming them together that someone was watching and the fact was to be published all over the world. The point I wish to make is that the operator should not be careful only sometimes, but all the time, since he never knows who is watching his work. The very time he becomes careless is likely to be the time someone is watching, whom he would least of all like to have see his lapse from the straight and narrow path of good projection. The correspondent sending in this letter is about to take a trip through the South and will send in notes from the various cities along his route.

Motiograph Outside Shutter.—North Tonawanda, N. Y., writes: "I notice you do not altogether credit my statement as regards the needling of carbons (page 1077, May 13th issue), but I can nevertheless prove that I am right. As regards my projection, you may look at my picture for three hours and if you find a shadow or blurred corner in all of that time I will make you a present of a five-dollar bill."

I wish, Neighbor, that more operators could make that kind of an offer and back it up. Tonawanda is using a Motiograph machine on which he has installed an outside shutter. He sent me a drawing of the same and I could not understand it. I requested him to send a better sketch, and he has kindly supplied it as below.



You will notice in the sketch that the blades of the shutter are only 1½ inches wide. Before publishing this sketch, I wrote Tonawanda and asked for a paper pattern of the shutter, which he very kindly sent, and it is just as it is drawn. The round, or hub, part of the shutter is 4 inches in diameter; the blades are 1½ inches in width by 3½ inches in length. They are of aluminum, riveted to the round part. Well, in this matter, I must confess that you are at entire liberty to "search me." I do not know what Tonawanda is driving at. The sketch, you will notice, shows apparently only one blade to the shutter. That is to say, one blade and a flicker blade, both of which are only 1½ inches in width, the diameter of the whole being 11½ inches. On the face of it, the thing seems to be not improbable, but totally and entirely impossible. I, therefore, pass the matter up to our readers for comment. With that diameter of shutter the main blade would have to be, I should say, something like 5½ inches wide in order to cover the lens during the time the picture is in motion. Tonawanda assures me that he is using this shutter and that it is absolutely flickerless. Beyond question, his last statement would be true, but if he can do anything like that—that is to say, use a shutter blade 1½ inches wide, on a total diameter of 11½ inches, then he is cutting only about 10 per cent. of the light, whereas all machines to date cut from 41 to 52 per cent. I should really like to see the performance of Tonawanda's machine. He also sends a paper pattern of an inside shutter he used, the same being only 1½ inches at its widest point. Tonawanda says: "I find this shutter to be absolutely flickerless even when there is no film in the machine." If Tonawanda has a kodak, or can borrow one, I wish he would take a snap shot of the machine with the shutter on, and send it to me.

New York Operators' Union.—During the past two months there has been a great deal of activity put forth by the Moving Picture Operators' Union Auxiliary to No. 35 I. A. T. S. E., New York City. This activity has been along organization lines and very much has been accomplished, the membership of the Union having mounted to several hundred. It begins to look now, however, as if there were a large possibility of all this work being undone by reason of what seems to be, at least to some extent, internecine jealousies and fighting. Apparently there is, whether intentional or not, a determination on the part of a certain section of the city to control everything. On the other hand, there seems to be some disposition on the part of Local Union No. 35 to be unreasonable in the treatment of the Moving Picture Operators' Auxiliary. A third disturbing element lies in the fact that up to date the meetings have been more or less turbulent—usually more rather than less—due very largely to the fact that the meetings are not governed according to the set forms known as parliamentary law, and the further fact that the chairman of the meetings, however well intentioned, has not proven capable of governing the meetings in the best way. Just what all of this will finally lead to is, of course, an open question. It appears certain, however, that the Union can accomplish no large amount of good for the operators until the deplorable state of affairs described is eliminated. Owing to the turbulent meetings and the petty bickerings and quarrelings going on outside, some of the very best men connected with the organization have expressed an intention to give up their cards. It is most earnestly to be hoped that they will do nothing of the sort. Such an action would be foolish and would not be a credit to their intelligence. The writer himself will frankly admit that he has been disgusted with some of the proceedings. He realizes the fact, however, that if the standard of the New York operator is to be raised there has got to be an effective organization. Mind you, I do not say altogether the condition of the operator, though that, too, is important, but I also refer to the standard of work. There is a crying need for an effective organization from any and every point of view, and such an organization will ultimately be very largely to the benefit of the exhibitor himself as well as to the operator. It can never be, however, until the men take hold, dig in, and run the affairs of the organization in the way they should be run. Petty jealousies, scrapping, back-biting and bickering never in this world accomplished anything and, moreover, they never will. The good men—that is to say, the cool, level headed men—should attend the meetings and stand together until the present storm of foolishness has passed or is crushed out, after which there will be the possibility of accomplishing something really worth while. Later: The last meeting, held Monday evening, showed marked improvement over those which have gone before. The attendance was larger and order was considerably better maintained. About fifty new members were added to the rolls. Financial matters of the union are in excellent shape.

Carbon Set Criticised.—Washington, D. C., orders Handbook and writes: "I note on page 952, April 29th issue, Mr. Charles Lauve's article on A. C. carbon setting. I am unable to see how it will work as he says, unless the lower carbon holder has a forward shift; since when the lower carbon burns off half an inch or more, the crater will swing around to the rear of the top carbon, away from the condensers."

I do not see myself just how Neighbor Lauve's set is going to deliver the goods, though the cut was not made quite right, due to an error on the part of the engraver. The lines representing the lamp should have been slanted at the usual angle, which would throw the top carbon on the usual slope. This, however, would not alter the fact that exactly what you name would occur as the carbons were fed down.

"The New Dress" (Biograph).—Here we have a picture in which a temporarily unbalanced reason plays a part. A young woman is promised a new dress by her husband, but he, under the influence of wine, gives it to another woman, telling his wife he lost it. When she sees it on the other she loses her mind, but when a little one comes to the house she is fully restored, all memory of the dress having vanished. Comment seems scarcely necessary. The new feature is the cause which restores the woman's mind. The picture is very true to life, temporary insanity under the circumstances being not uncommon.

"The Angel of the Slums" (Lubin).—This well told story has for its heroine a young woman settlement worker. She saves a thief and induces him to become a man. The views of slum life are characteristic and are interesting to audiences unfamiliar with such scenes. In a way, too, the film shows the kind of work the social settlements do. It is not too much to call the picture educational.

"The Accomplice" (Pathe).—Here is a picture which will affect people differently. The acting is satisfactory and it has one novel situation, where the involved clubman is killed by a concealed mechanism when he opens the unlocked safe. The serpentine steps and lithe motions of the dancer whose attempt to warn her lover, while she amuses the baron, fails, is interesting. We have seen much more suggestive exhibitions on the vaudeville stage. The picture exists for the sake of this scene. This picture is more decadent than Oscar Wilde's "Salome," because the story is not strong. It may be called in some quarters salacious.

"Winter Sports at Lucerne, Switzerland" (Pathe).—This picture shows winter life at high altitudes. The sports illustrated are the various amusements in which the hardy mountaineers indulge. The photography deserves special commendation, since to successfully photograph such swiftly moving objects and make them stand out so clear requires skill of the highest order. The film is short, but is so good that the audience wishes for more.

"Discharging the Cook" (Selig).—This is a slapstick comedy in which a bull puts a quantity of dynamite play important parts. The husband, wife, children, bull pup and dynamite each make a demonstration, yet the cook is obdurate and refuses to be discharged. Eventually, however, a truce is patched up and the cook marches out with the honors of war.

"Dear, Kind Hubby" (Selig).—This is a short, snappy comedy, illustrating how a business man goes about cooking a dinner. He gets the women in the audience several hearty laughs, then he telephones for a cook. The astonishing thing is that he didn't send for help before. He did many funny things and some foolish ones. He stepped on one of those long handled floor-brushes and its handle wacked him on the nose. That was a human experience, as this reviewer is aware from experience.

"His Mother" (Vitagraph).—The leading character is played by Mrs. Mary Maurice and the doctor, her son, by Maurice Costello. The doctor's fiancée, by Hazel Neason. The object of the story is to picture a young doctor's fear of having his plain, old mother, whom he loves, meet his stylish fiancee. This brought about an unpleasant situation, but the fear was entirely needless, and all the worry and temporary sorrow it caused was borne without any good reason. This picture is true of life.

"The Samourai's Expiation" (Pathe).—This is a tinted film showing finely colored scenes in Japan. It gives a well-constructed drama which is clear and intelligently acted. Its object seems chiefly to show a remarkable jiu-jitsu fight to the death between a Samourai and a young merchant, the one with a sword, the other with a staff. This contest, though long, is well conducted and very interesting indeed. It takes place under the smiliing face of a stone Buddah.

"The Quarrel on the Cliff" (Edison).—This love story is not made so clear as this company usually makes its stories, though the main outlines of its love and jealousy are quite apparent. This reviewer quite missed the meaning of the last scene. The background is very interesting, being rocky hills and sand wastes under tropic sunlight. The photographer has made beautiful pictures of these scenes, sometimes at the expense of the characters, though, in one interior of the cabin, the picture was perfect, absolutely, faces and background as well. There's a lantern search in it, but the lantern isn't lit.

"The Baby of the Boarding House" (Edison).—The object of this picture is to contrast the characters of two young men, one an idler who probably merely needs to be wakened up, the other an industrious plodder, intelligent but not "smart." It is not highly dramatic, but so true that it might pass as a slice of real life. It is a play that gives half a dozen actors a chance to do creative work in imagining each a character. They are all good, but perhaps the boarding house keeper, mother of the baby, is the best. Her indignation at the situation, as she see it, is natural, and she pictures it well, though her trusting her baby with the idler was a good recommendaton for him. He really looked for a job next morning, though the play didn't show it. It is hard to see how this picture could have been made better in any way, mechanically or artistically.

"The Loyalty of Don Luis Verdugo" (Kalem).—The story given here is of California in the days of 1848 after Southern California had been ceded to the United States. It represents a Spanish Don objecting strenuously to the domination of the new government and refusing to haul down his Mexican flag. A love episode begins between the Don's daughter and an American lieutenant, with corresponding jealousy on the part of the Mexican. The setting is picturesque, much of the action taking place around a house more than 100 years old. The girl's ride for help and the soldiers' ride to the ranch are features which rouse enthusiasm in the audience.

"The Abernathy Kids' Rescue" (Pathe).—This film illustrates a thrilling story in which the now famous Abernathy Kids, Louis and Temple, and their father play the conspicuous parts. The Kids are driven up a tree by wolves and their father, going to their rescue, does the famous wolf catch, bare handed. There is no question about the popularity of this film. It will bring rounds of applause almost anywhere.

"The Traitor" (Urban).—We have here an Italian story of smugglers and smuggling with marvelous marine scenery in a beautiful tint. There are also scenes showing interesting rocky shores. The story of the smugglers and the treachery of one of their number is rather hackneyed, with its dropped letter, etc. The girl's dive into the water is a new incident, but there could hardly be a tamer chase than that of the officers following the smugglers each in a little sailboat. The selection of the views and the photography deserve especial commendation.

"Rubber Neck Percy" (Urban).—This series of comic pictures introduces us to the inquisitiveness of Percy. His propensity for investigation leads him into all sorts of painful experiences, but his mania is not cured. It is not even modified. And the audience gets much amusement before the short and snappy comic ends.

"The Puncher's New Love" (Essanay).—This strong drama has scenes laid both in the West and the East. It tells the story of a Western cowboy who deserts his Western sweetheart for a girl from the East. This perfidy costs him his life. The play is mostly pathetic, but there are a few bits of comedy that relieve the gloom. The film probably will be popular.

"In the Days of Nero" (Gaumont).—The object of this dramatic picture is to show how human fate sometimes makes a cowardly thrust one way shoot arrow-like at another miss the intended butt and make a victim of the one who sent it forth. In this case, the poison Locustra gives to Nero for Britannicus is stolen by her son and causes his death and her own great sorrow. If the spectators could know, that in the street scene, the reveler who is stealing the wine is Locustra's son and that she loves him, the picture would be far more effective. As it is, they know it only when the messengers come to Locustra with the sad news. It is a very graceful picture! this reviewer thinks it the best Roman picture he has seen. The street revelers with Lo-custra's son dance gracefully and make a very beautiful scene.

The acting of the whole cast is good; but Locustra's picture of the tragic situation is excellent. The film is colored and the photography is very good.

"Lucia's Broken Romance" (Pathe).—This film pictures the sorrow of an old Italian woman who doesn't know what has happened to her daughter. The girl was a street violinist who had genius, but a famous pianist has helped her to make a position for herself in the world and she has forgotten her old mother and father. She is brought back and plays as the old woman dies content. Paul Panzer takes the part of the father, and Martha Spier, the part of the daughter. If the father had been made to appear older, the picture would have been clearer, for this reviewer first thought that the two were brother and sister, and later saw his mistake but thought them man and wife. The acting is commendable and the photography very good.

"In the Baggage Coach Ahead" (Edison).—This picture illustrates a poem, popular some years ago, representing a young man trying to quiet a crying baby, and when asked why he doesn't take the child to its mother, he replies that she is "in the baggage coach ahead." The picture illustrates the story as he tells it, and closes as a woman takes the child and one by one the passengers steal away, leaving him with his great grief. The picture is highly emotional, is excellent mechanically and fairly impresses the audience with its power.

"When a Man's Married" (Vitagraph).—This comedy is based upon the experience of a married man who by mistake exchanges cameras with a reporter friend. The married man, Jack Howard, is played by James Morrison; Mabel, Jack's wife, by Mabel Nelson, and the reporter by Edward Phillips. The playlet is made the more attractive by the few characters included. When Jack's pictures come home his wife sees pictures of women in interesting poses; they are the press pictures of a theatrical attraction. If the reporter hadn't shown up, there would have been a separation. The parts are well played and the film is sufficinetly amusing to keep the audience in good humor.

"The Bankrupt" (Gaumont).—This romance represents one banker ruining another because the man's daughter refuses to marry him. But the girl's lover turns up at the opportune time with a gold mine worth half a million sterling, metaphorically, in his vest pocket, saves the ruined banker from suicide and marries the girl in quite the old story-book manner. The story is clear, acted quietly and naturally. The photography is clear.

"Prejudice of Pierre Marie" (Vitagraph).—Here is a story of love and jealousy, developing some excellent character drawing in the two men. Jean, played by William Humphreys, is a well drawn, good natured, honest fellow. Pierre, played by Tefft Johnson, is quite the opposite, yet Babette, played by Florence E. Turner, selects Pierre as her husband. He becomes jealous without cause. But later, when Pierre is shot while smuggling, it is Jean who ministers to him, who hides him until the officers pass, and binds up his wounds as his life blood ebbs away. The story is one of those simple heart tales. The audience follows with attention from beginning to end.

Independent.

"Gen. Marion, the Swamp Fox" (Champion).—One of the most romantic characters in the great Revolutionary struggle, General Marion, is successfully reproduced in this photoplay. His exploits in this picture illustrate his character as well as any in his career. His feats at the fall of Fort Watson in 1781 and the victory at Eutaw Springs the same year are woven into a graphic, historically accurate and entertaining picture. The women in the picture show themselves worthy mothers of the nation. The setting is historically accurate. This film would be a valuable adjunct in schools for the illustration of American history. The Champion company has done itself credit by its excellent work in this film.

"Engaged in Spite of Themselves" (Eclair). This is an interesting, well acted comedy. It is not a picture of life, but a pleasing theatrical fantasy. Two young people, engaged by their parents, arrange a little "game" to deceive the old folks. They succeed only to find that they have fallen in love. It causes some laughter and a good deal of smiling.

"The Master and the Man" (Imp).—Here is a somewhat complicated story, dealing with love and disappointment, thievery and unjust suspicion, the death of one man and the assumption of the blame for stealing a necklace by another to save the dead man's name from disgrace. Its purpose seems to be to show a noble spirit awakening in a man who had been a thief. The picture closes with this man's return to prison for a crime of his old pal, now dead, by suicide. Even though the story is complicated, and involves many persons, it is plain enough to be understood, if watched with care, and the audience plainly liked it. The Imp players put a great deal of vigor and sympathy into the acting. The mechanical work is equally well done.

"An Indian Brave's Conversion" (Yankee).—Here is a picture which is based upon elemental human passions. The scenes are laid in a mining camp, peopled by the usual characters. The minister's efforts seem to bear little fruit. The advent of the minister's daughter changes the situation, however, and a love story develops. In a melee a converted Indian commits a crime, for which the lover, Tom, is to be hanged. The girl and the Indian mount and ride furiously, arriving just in time to save Tom's life. The story is well told and many interesting situations develop while the picture is running.

"Across the Mexican Line" (Solax, April 28).—This film is mentioned again to emphasize the assertion heretofore made that it is sometimes difficult to tell how a picture will take with a different audience. For example, this picture was seen first in New York. It made scarcely a ripple. It was seen next in Chicago, in a crowded house in a small town and was greeted with wild applause. Almost every move the lieutenant made when de Castro surprised him was applauded, while the Mexican was hissed. The girl at work on the telegraph pole sending the message to the American headquarters was almost continuously applauded, and the plunging ride of the American troopers brought forth round after round, closing with an outburst of several minutes when they arrive, stop the execution and capture the Mexicans. The American loves a contest, and if his side wins he is all the more enthusiastic. The illustration of that spirit in this picture pleases the audience in the average theater beyond calculation. There is life, action, but above all that illustration of contrast, the running of a fight and the exemplification of fair play. Apparently managers will have no difficulty in pleasing their audiences with this picture.

"Making a Man of His Son" (Champion).—Even though the acting and the mechanical work of this film are good, the writer does not like the story. But any man who knows anything about jails and their influence understands full well that they seldom make men. They are far more likely to develop criminals. When the son comes from prison the father does another mean thing. He sees a secret vow of friendship to treat a man who had once killed under temptation. To treat him such an act as would be looked upon as despicable by a boy is a poor way to make a man.

"After Twenty Years" (Nestor).—This is a story of vast memory lasting twenty years, revived by sight of a picture drawn by a child. The story is made more interesting by the striking photographic effects which the Nestor people know so well how to produce. It is a joy to look at a Nestor picture because of its photographic beauties. The individuality is quite so marked in this one as it has been in those produced previously by the company.

"A Left Hook" (Reliance).—On the face we have a comedy, the feature of which is Algernon's rueful look as he examines his battered countenance in the glass after receiving word from the girl that she doesn't care for kissing anyhow and all the while he has received was her outcry. He doesn't know about the kiss to the one that caused her enthusiasm.

"Tweedledum Is Late" (Auburndale).—It has been some time since this favorite comedian has appeared but his absence has not injured his comedy producing powers. He keeps the audience up to the high mark of laughter throughout.

"Nearly a Hero" (Solax).—The comedy presents a phase of matrimonial affairs that every interested lovers. Jane's lightning change resulted in his acquiring a reputation as a hero, which pleased the girl's father, and all went well afterward.

"The Foreman's Bride" (Lubin).—The realistic comedy of a gang. It is well constructed and acted and has two or three scenes that in themselves will appeal to many. The hungry man coming on to dinner, to find the cook dead drunk and nothing to eat is one of these. There is a human quality about the story that is welcome after the picture is blue plus among other releases of the week.

"The Regimental Ball" (Unbeknown).—The object of this story is to give a picture of romantic love with a realistic background. It succeeds in getting life as an army post. It is remarkably successful. Not only is it true to human nature, or made to seem so by good acting, but it is true to military etiquette and to army life as nearly as possible. In the first scene for literature is a bit too flighty but he amply makes up by excellent characterization later. The colonel's daughter and Jack show us two sensible human beings. It is a very good film well photographed and interesting.

"Air Bubbles" (American).—We call them soap bubbles in America. They are blown by a very unscientific, spoiled boy but they show him pictures that send him home contrite and very happy indeed that his good mother is still alive and ready to live and forgive him. There is an entirely fine and fresh idea in this picture. It is worked out so well and makes so powerful an impression that there is no question in the spectator's mind as to whether it is a French or an American picture. There's a touch of universality in it that would make it just as well understood in China as here. We heartily recommend it. In fact, it's a master picture.

"As Your Hair Grows White" (Powers).—Thirty years elapse after the lovers were separated, the man comes back from Alaska. The girl is still unmarried, and her blond hair has turned to silver. The man returns, his hair, too, is gray, and, after convincing the butler who he is, there is a touching reconciliation, and the gray hairs are forgotten in the renewal of the youthful love. The picture interests because of its appeal to love deep enough to endure even though hairs are silver with passing years.

"For Her Brother's Sake" (Imp).—The object of this film is to create a romantic impression by letting a young girl ride a beautiful, jet black race horse to victory and so pay off the mortgage with her prize money. The situation that made her action necessary, as it is developed step by step, is handled so well that every bit of it is clear and effective. Two races are shown on the screen before the climax when the heroine rides up to the bars a victor. Neither of the races is exciting; they are both processions, but the excitement of the faces on the stands is shown and that keeps up the interest. The characterizing of every one in the story is good. But the man who takes the part of Mr. Spotwood, who appears only for a moment, is perfection, and the heroine (Little Mary) is the part's true personality to the very breath. It's a good film.

"The Guardsman" (Rex).—Beautiful setting and excellent acting make this an effective picture. Taken alone, the story is commonplace, but the Rex Company has given great charm to every one of its scenes. The tinting is varied in nearly every scene and it is always just right, while the photography has brought out the details so clearly that the actors have had ample chance to show the emotional possibilities of the situation. It is a commendable film, telling how the daughter of an inkeeper saved the king from being poisoned. The acting of the old innkeeper is perhaps worthy special notice.

"The Conflict" (Reliance).—The object of this drama is to picture a struggle between good and evil in the soul of a young girl. This reviewer doesn't feel that as a picture of such a struggle it is wholly convincing. He has persuaded himself that the reason for this is that the talented cast has sacrificed some humanity to the necessity of making the story clear. In one scene a bunch of roses is made to serve as a symbol of a great deal more than one ordinarily sees in them. The effect, to this reviewer, was not at all adequate. The roses didn't explain the girl's sudden change of attitude. Nor does the reviewer think the girl's sudden reaching toward the crucifix held up was a natural motion in such a girl. In plain words, this reviewer didn't think the drama a truthful picture of human life. The story is poor and the action unnecessarily disagreeable, although evil is overcome at the end of the picture. It was also seen in a theater in a small city and the audience was so deeply touched that a sigh of relief was audible when the villain left the monastery and the girl in peace.

"A Matrimonial Surprise" (Powers).—This comedy makes them laugh. Here is 300 pounds of bachelor poking fun at his married friends when irate wives interfere with a poker game. But his fall is hard. He marries a 90 pound woman, and what she does to him makes the audience laugh. He is painfully operating at the wash tub in one scene, while her final humiliation comes when he is shown as nurse for bawling twins.

"Oklahoma" (Powers).—Here is a Western romance. There is a picture of a "home-read battery" in it. The story is clear, but there is nothing very beautiful in it. The bandit who marries the heroine, who seems to be a worthy young woman, although she did give way to a sickly sentimentality when she aided him, a fugitive from justice, to escape. The man who marries them might have been the governor, he seems to be a big official. However, the bandit cleared himself from his crimes, and wasn't fit to marry a good woman, it seems. The picture of the old pioneer is very good.

"Broncho Buster's Rival" (Bison).—This Western story exists chiefly to give pictures of rough riding. It opens with a scene in which the "buster" rides a horse that romps about, bucking, starting, etc. It makes an interesting exhibition, and attracts the heroine. The hero comes; the "buster" turns out bad man, and the usual chase follows. The chief difference is that in this picture the riding is more interesting than in the usual film. The hero, after showing that he is weak and unworthy of a woman's trust, gets married. It was well received both in New York and the suburbs.

"The Colonel and the King" (Thanhouser).—In this picture little Marie Eline takes the leading part. Its charm is her personality. Among other interesting scenes, we see her, as the little outcast king, coming into the Land of the Free through Ellis Island. His little majesty has a good time giving his guardian the slip in Battery Park, New York City, and meets a big policeman, who puts him on the train at the new Pennsylvania R. R. station. The picture pleased.

"Circle C's New Boss" (Champion).—The ranch in this story is left to an Eastern lady, who shows at once that she knows how to boss. The superintendent, whom she has discharged, is a bad man and tries to do her a great wrong. The new boss rescues her with the help of the boys, one of whom is of great assistance. There was no immediate necessity for a marriage, but we are treated to two, and the boys after the ceremony bang away at the ceiling of the parlor. If they used ball cartridges, the plaster must have suffered. The story is clearly told and has some very good scenes. As a whole, it is acceptable. The photography is good.

"His Dumb Wife" (Solax).—This is a sprightly vaudeville and has a good deal of charm, mostly owing to the work of the young lady who plays the wife. When the doctor gives power of speech to her by taking a long piece of tape, or perhaps it's a shaving, from her throat, she begins a sixty mile-a-minute talk. She talks even to the sunfish in the water barrel. This is very good; it makes the film worth while. It might have had a better setting, though, than the rest of the sketch gives it. The photography is excellent.

"The Harvest" (Reliance).—This is a story of a husband's jealousy of an artist, and the jealousy of the artist's wife. Both have cause to be jealous. The woman is more magnanimous than the man and she covers the situation to shield the weaker woman, then she leaves her unworthy artist-husband. The relationship of the people in the story didn't seem clear to this reviewer and so he couldn't follow its thread very closely. The photography is fair.

"The Nun" (Great Northern).—A love story told with considerable dramatic power, which illustrates the intrigue of a monk and his attempt to get a girl into his power. The climax comes when the girl, convicted of blasphemy, is condemned to be buried alive, and the sentence is to be executed just as a prince, to whom she appealed, arrives with a body of men and rescues her. She falls into the arms of her lover, while the villain is hurried away to punishment. The story, as given, has offended the religious sensibilities of very many earnest people of all denominations; and especially Roman Catholics, whether they are especially earnest or not, feel distaste at seeing the crucifix handled without reverence.

PATHE.

SHOOTING THE RAPIDS IN JAPAN.—In this film a party of men and women start in a long seine canoe, and, by means of a current in the bottom of Japan, they shoot the rapids—witness of a spot from the bank would not have the rapids settled. Presently they approach a gorge through which the waters rush furious. A narrow place between rocks is the most exciting navigable. It seems that the canoe must inevitably dashed to pieces, but the passengers quit themselves out of the danger with the utmost nonchalance. Time and time again during the trip the party excels in the most dangerous of complete destruction to the turbulent seething swirling waters which dash over the cruel rocks as some wild animal licking its lips in anticipation of feasting on its prey. After three hours of this perilous boating the party bring themselves point from which they started and again safe on the wide, calm surface of a sort of lake.

THE HEART OF AN INDIAN MAID.—A party of trappers is attacked by Indians and all escape but one, who is badly wounded. The Indians, however, start in pursuit of the fleeing trappers and the wounded man is found by Winonah and taken to camp, where she nurses him back to health, saving his life by pleading with the chief. Upon his recovery he becomes a bosom brother of the chief by the intermingling of blood from his wrist with that of the chief. This ceremony over, Winonah is given to him as his wife. Soon, however, the supposed dead hero makes his reunite and returns to his real wife and child. He is seen and followed, however, by an Indian who was in love with Winonah, and this Indian reports his whereabouts to the chief, who determines to kill Winonah's husband, and, overhearing the conversation, begs the privilege of taking her own revenge and armed with a long knife she starts on the fifteen-day journey to the white man's house. Footsore and weary she finally reaches a house in the clearing and sinks down exhausted. The white woman in the house takes her and cares for her and the little child amuses her. Seeing a photograph on the table Winonah is startled to find it the trapper whom she is supposed to have married. Making inquiries she discovers that he is the father of the little child and that he has come upon her knee. Just then the father returns and Winonah, steals into a corner unobserved by any of the party. The father takes the child on his knee lap with playful caresses. In the background Winonah is steadily approaching to the white man's revenge. She wavers between hatred and love. Finally, love mastering, she quietly slips out and leaves the family in peace. She returns to the camp Winonah slips over a precipice and is killed.

SEMIRAMIS.—This magnificent film is a portrayal of that period when Ninus was king of Babylon. This is the king who, in order to gratify his desire for luxury and elegance, built the "Hanging Gardens." Semiramis, wishing to be queen herself, was a woman of low estate, living in the country, but her beauty so appealed to the king that he made her his wife. Semiramis, filled with lust for power, Semiramis plots the death of her husband, and Ninus is assassinated. The people of Babylon are horror struck at the dastardly deed of the cleaner wildly outside the palace gates for the life of the regicide, but Semiramis, by her audacity and exceeding great beauty quells the clamoring mob when appearing in their midst. Semiramis later wins the esteem of the people by successfully taking the field with her army and repulsing the invasion of the Arabs. Babylon then celebrates with great feasting and merry-making in the Hanging Gardens. Finally, after a glorious reign, Semiramis, according to the legend, ascends to heaven on a cloud and immediately after her death the walls of Babylon fell before the invasion from Arabia.

ALL FOR MONEY.—Mr. Shaw is on his deathbed. By his side kneels Mary, his daughter, and near him bed is Mr. Stafford, and Mary Sherlock, the friend's son. Just before he dies Shaw shows to the group assembled about his bed his will, leaving everything he possesses to his daughter unless she should die before reaching the age of 21, under which circumstances his wealth shall go to Stafford. The executor of his will is Mr. Stafford and Mary Sherlock after Shaw's death Stafford is ruined on the stock market, and the only chance he can see of recovering his fortune is through the marriage of his son with Mary. To this Mary objects strenuously as she has a lover, but Stafford threatens her the love of gold has so eaten into the heart of Stafford that he stops at nothing, and in a rage separates the lovers and persuades Mary that he is going to take her away to a quiet country place where she can forget her unhappy love affair. Instead she is taken to a lunatic asylum and incarcerated there. This, however, does not get him the money, so Stafford plans her death. Fortunately this is overheard by a nurse, who gives the alarm to Mary, who escapes by means of a rope slanting the police, they return entering the room suddenly just in time to see Stafford, his son and the head of the asylum attempting to stab what they believe is the form of Mary asleep in her bed.

KALEM.

THE CARRIER PIGEON.—Molly, white among her favorite pigeons, is approached by Jack, whose boldness receives a hard rebuke. Two months later Jack, grown to manhood, sends the pigeon on another flight and makes the most of the opportunity. A few days later Molly receives the bird's news, comes across a half-breed Indian, who is unsuccessfully beating his horse. Jack stops the Indian's cruel treatment of the pony and receives the half-breed in revenge the Indian plans to raid the bullion wagon. Jack, getting out on a trip to the mining camps, Molly's pigeon for a long flight. While on his way he is ambuscaded by the Indians. Jack puts up a good, stiff fight, but the odds are against him. As a last resort he scribbles a message on a piece of his handkerchief and attaches it to the pigeon and sends the bird on its way. The message is delivered. Molly quickly organizes a rescue party, which rides to the rescue, arriving just in the nick of time.

TANGLED LINES.—The Samsudos, on the warpath, pursues the Marsh family and takes the young son captive. Hours later, grandmother and Liza are rescued by James Ward, a passing stranger. Young Ward soon after Liza proposes to marry the man who rescued and raised her. James Ward brings to his home a wounded Indian trader. A week later Ward is called away and leaves the stranger to protect the women. A week passes. Liza forgets gratitude and loyalty in her strange fascination for the stranger. Learning of Liza's affection for the stranger Ward decides to efface himself and leaves the home. The man he thinks she loves, but fate takes a hand. Liza learns that the stranger is her own brother. Ward's departure he leaves a note that explains the situation. The woundhood in Liza wins, and she goes in search of Ward and is eventually rewarded.

SELIG.

THE HERDERS.—Pedro loves Wana, the daughter of Buck Henshaw, the square-man. Jim Haley, an American sheep-buyer, is also smitten with the charms of the pretty half-breed, and getting his under the influence of liquor, persuades the squaw-man to compel Wana to marry him.

Pedro is heartbroken as his poor little Indian sweetheart takes away, a sacrifice to her unnatural parents' greed for money. Goaded to desperation by the sight of her misery, the poor Mexican herderess her sheep on foot until the town of Santa Gabriel is reached. Leaving Wana outside a saloon, the sheep-buyer enters to refresh himself after his long ride.

Pedro takes advantage of this opportunity to urge Wana to go with him to the Mission and there be married to him by the good Padre. The poor girl, half in fear, yet blessing her young sweetheart's delivering her from the man whom she looks upon as a human monster, gives her consent, and they are married.

When the half drunken sheep-buyer finds the bird has flown, he returns to the home of the squaw-man and compels him to refund the money he has paid, which is always a preliminary to the old rascal's threats.

The two lovers are now happy and wander afar-hand in hand over the green hills to the little cote Pedro has built for his bride.

STABILITY vs. NOBILITY.—Bradley, a rich New Yorker, comes West to look at his mining properties accompanied by his friend, Count Philip, and his valet. In bringing a large sum of money from the bank bank out to his team, with which to pay off his men, he is observed by a band of desperadoes of two bad frontier men, who at once plan to rob him.

They ambush him at a canyon and tie him as his superintendent, the much frightened count assists his valet (who is a crook) to escape. The cowboys, looking up the canyon for stray cattle, overhear their cries, and come to the rescue as the robbers ready to make off with their booty. After a short pursuit, overtaking the robbers and recovering the money.

Bradley is so gratified that he offers them a trip to New York at his expense, and they accept. The boy soon gets into "Broadway Rose" clothes at the cow-town store, and thinking themselves quite properly dressed for the effects East, they descend upon the metropolis and astonish the natives.

That night at the reception they make a great sensation, attired in rented dress suits, and in an entirely breezy and good natured way they mortify a effend their host. That is a sting for the eldest daughter, and he demands satisfaction—a duel. The girls beg the boys to have a mock duel and make him ridiculous and so get rid of him. This they do with the aid of Bradley and his friends. For they bring the cowboys on grounds in time to see them performing some marvelous feats with their six-shooters, and he realizing that to face a duel of that kind would certainly mean death declines.

After some time in New York the boys wear off much of their Western gaucherie and make good progress in the affections of the two girls.

MELIES.

THE IMMORTAL ALAMO.—About 1722 Spain in her endeavor of Texas manned by the confederation of Indians, who called themselves Tejas, established the Franciscan mission of San Antonio de Valero (The Alamo). About the mission was built the pueblo cottages and prettier characters, which formed the nucleus of the present city of San Antonio.

In 1824 Texas withdrew from Mexico and formed a separate state, which was ruled by Stephen Austin, the self-styled Napoleon of the West, was sent to force her back into allegiance.

At San Antonio in 1836, Col. William B. Travis was in command of the fort. With him was Colonel William Barret Travis (Travis' brother), Bowie and a small force. He received word that Santa Anna, at the head of a Mexican army of seven thousand men, was marching on the city. Travis dispatched a message to Gen. Sam. Houston for aid, sending Lieut. Dickenson, and taking his force of 150 men shut himself in the city, in which also was Dickenson's wife, Lucy; he retired to the Alamo.

On February 23, Santa Anna sent a message to surrender, and upon the brave refusal of Travis he attacked the fort. Travis held his position. March 6, 1836, his little force constantly diminishing.

On that day, when all seemed lost, Travis drew a line with his sword down the centre of the room and asked all who would be with him to come to his side. All crossed save one, Rose, who announced his determination to try to escape. He succeeded in leaving the building but was never heard from again.

A breach was made in the wall by the cannon of Santa Anna, and the Mexicans entered to find all the men dead except Travis and four companions, Bowie, Crockett, Dickenson, Dickenson and the spot: and Lucy Dickenson, with two other women and three children, were all to leave the Alamo alive.

THE TEMPTRESS.—At an informal gathering of artists and musicians in the apartment of Vassill, a violinist, Aileen, the musician's sweetheart, is made jealous when Cleo De Belleville, flirts with her lover. At a Halloween party some time later, Cleo again tries to alienate the affections of the musician, and succeeds in turning the foolish young man's head. After the party Cleo tells Vassill that her suede is about to disinherit her and ordains a plan to fix which she sees no way with her guardian. Vassill is at first loath to aid her, but the woman's power over him has weakened his better nature and he accepts. Aileen, who has overheard the plot, finds an opportunity to substitute the poisonous powders intended for Cleo's uncle with a harmless sleeping powder, and at the party given by Cleo a week later the powder results only in bringing the rich man into a deathlike sleep. Knowing that the host has been deliberately poisoned he soon guesses at the party a detective is summoned and an investigation made which leads to the arrest of Cleo, who has been forced to administer the powders owing to Vassill's final rebellion at entering into the plot. Restoratives are administered to the stricken man, who soon regains consciousness and it is then that Aileen secretly explains to Vassill how she had thwarted Cleo's plot. Vassill pleads for forgiveness which is generously granted by his true sweetheart.

THE LUCKY CARD.—George Maxwell a young cowboy rescues a fever stricken Mexican peon named Miguel Sandoval and in the latter's gratitude as a good Samaritan, gives the lumberjack a sum of money to care for the stricken man until he recovers. HEARTS AND FLAGS—At the outbreak of the Civil War Colonel Ingram, a prosperous commander of a regiment of Georgia infantry. He leaves his home and his two daughters, Virginia and Georgina, in charge of his old overseer, Uncle Wash, and starts for the front.

A year later, as school is about to end and his body brought home and buried in the family burying ground. The action of the war sweeps southward and Virginia and her sister Georgina are left entirely deserted by all their slaves and servants except faithful old Wash.

A straggling party of Union soldiers, very much the worse for liquor, appear and demand entrance. Uncle Wash bravely resists them, but they brutally overpower him and make free use of everything that comes in the door. Then comes a scene of looting in which the soldiers appropriate everything of value.

One of them starts to seize Virginia, and poor old Wash in trying to defend his mistress is promptly thrown to the floor, but managing, selzing Virginia's pets squeals down the chimney. This emerges his remarques and very start for the girls, when they are interrupted by the entrance of Captain Percy and a squad of Union soldiers. Percy clears out the house and placing two guards at the door, assures Virginia that she will not be molested further. As he is about to leave he is, the exasperating squeal an old-wound.

Virginia has him put to bed and nurses him during a serious illness. Percy falls desperately in love with his lovely nurse, but she remains true to her colors and will not notice his love.

Virginia and her sister are busily engaged meeting a Confederate flag, which was torn by the foregoing party, when Georgina is discovered by Captain Percy enters the room and seeing them scrutinizing for the lost pedle, offers his assistance, which is hastily declined.

Percy is finally obliged to return to his regiment. Before leaving he declares his love to Virginia. To Uncle Wash, however, he manages to give money to care for her, and also a farewell note in which he promises to return for her after the war.

When the war is over, true to his promise, Captain Percy does return, and finds no difficulty in making her surrender to a "Yank."

THE NIECE AND THE CHORUS LADY.—Jones' wife, mother-in-law and brother-in-law go to the seashore for recuperation, leaving Jones alone in town. After a time he receives a letter from his wife saying she intends staying on, but is sending her brother and her brother home to help him entertain. He is so disgusted at this that he overlooks a letter from his niece out west and she is going to pay him a visit, and rushes from the house with his umbrella.

Turning a windy corner he is run into by Mazie, a chorus girl, whose umbrella has turned inside out. The rain descends in torrents, and he gallantly lends her his umbrella and escorts her to her nearby doorway.

Mazie tells her experience to her associates and finding his name and address on the handle of the umbrella, decides to return it in person.

Jones mother-in-law and wife have just have just returned from the seaside. She finds his niece's letter and at once decides that she would be a splendid match for her son. The niece being an heiress in her own rights, and telegraphs Jones' wife to return and help entertain the niece.

Meantime Mazie calls and returns Jones' umbrella. The mother-in-law finds Jones with a strange young woman and demands an explanation. Jones, panic-stricken, introduces Mazie as his niece from the west. The mother-in-law at once proceeds to make Mazie feel at home and tries to fix up the match for her son.

The real niece arrives upon the scene and as he is warmly welcoming her, he is caught again by mother-in-law and on being cornered, not daring to tell the truth, admits he is still more interested as the niece, he introduces his real niece as the butler's wife.

Mazie, the brother-in-law, proposes to Mazie, who, thinking him a wealthy young man because of his surroundings, promptly accepts him, and they hurry out to get married.

As Jones is trying to straighten matters out with his niece his wife walks in and catches him in the act. Finding himself getting deeper and deeper into the mire, he decides to make a clean breast of everything and tells his wife that the young woman is his real niece from the west. The mother-in-law denies this, but Mazie, returning with her newly wedded husband, soon straightens matters out, and they finally succeed in obtaining forgiveness and a blessing from Auge's mother.

THE INHERITANCE.—It comes with a theist and his wife who have a small shop in an unfrequented part of the city where business is very bad and where customers are few. And thus, just when credit is gone and things look the darkest, news comes that an uncle in Australia has died and that they are left to a part of what he left.

A friendly newspaper man spreads the news abroad and they are soon overwhelmed with offers of credit and help. The landlord in spite of his stubborn refusal at the start before the inheritance, come to them immediately offers to fix up the shop and supply them with everything needful, and also hastens their taking up their abode in a new house which has just been finished. Of course all business begins to pick up.

Their bonds are very much turned by this state of affairs and they forget their old friends and become quite unpleasant patrons. Their social climbing ambitions by the swipping of the house in a ridiculously rapid fashion and by taking away of the two servants by their irate landlord.

IT SERVED HER RIGHT.—Mr. and Mrs. Hilltop live in unruffled serenity until one day they employ a cook, who is entirely too good looking for their domestic. Returning home from business Mr. Hilltop observes that his wife has left the back door ajar, his way into the house through the basement hallway, where he stops to give the cook some order pertaining to his favorite dish. Mrs. Hilltop, hearing her husband and the cook in conversation, determines to keep an eye on him.

The next day she is hurried to see shadows on the glass door leading to the kitchen which tell her that the cook is being embraced by a man whose outlines resemble Mr. Hilltop's.

The following day, at about the usual time for her husband's return, she sends the cook on an errand, quickly dons the cook's cap and apron and patiently awaits hubby. Presently she hears a heavy footstep, the door opens and she turns her back. The next moment she is seized in a fearlike embrace and a familiar voice whispers in her ear lips. Her eyes flashing fire with jealous wrath, she wheels about and is confronted with the face of the grinning iceman!

NESTOR.

AT PANTHER CREEK.—Having graduated from college and being duly admitted to the bar, Jack, and help to his vast mining interests, father and son held a long conference, and, as a result, Jack decided to start at the bottom round, as his parent had done.

Accordingly, armed with a letter of introduction to Superintendent Snell, the young man started for the mines, where he soon found plain but pleasant quarters at Forrester's boarding house.

All went well for a couple of months, until John McDonald discovered that his daughter, Allie, and the boss were becoming interested in each other. Incensed for the best, he commanded young Dawson to leave his house, and the next morning delivered Jack's belongings to the office.

The superintendent, hearing of what he termed, old man McDonald's "impertinence," frightly told the foreman that his services were no longer required.

In the meanwhile, however, Jack had visited the telegraph office, and with such good effect that as soon as Andrew Dawson could get away from town, he was duly reinstated in his old position, but much to the foreman's surprise, congratulated and applauded his son's good taste in selecting a bride.

THE TWO COCKADES.—The time is that of the Revolution, and the Marquis d'Auville and his wife have gained the favor of their old overlord, Burgo, hides his real feelings under demeanor stern and menacing of a "son of the people." The Marquis, taking this aside, confides his little boy to his care, ere he and his wife are taken before the tribunal and condemned to death. Trusty to his trust, Gorga determines to save the young Marquis, and the boy is disguised in girl's clothes, and succeeds in escaping. Twenty years elapse, and the Marquis—now a well-grown young fellow—learning that his beloved country is in danger, sails for France, and hastening to Napoleon, offers to fight for him, at the same time throwing the white cockade away. With a grim smile Bonaparte regards the young aristocrat, and then taking the tricolor from his hat, pins it to d'Auville's coat. Subsequently, in a fierce battle, the young man is severely wounded, fighting to retain the flag. Napoleon passes, and has the Marquis carried away. A few weeks later the Marquis rides up to his old home, and dismounting, seeks out the old servant Gorga. With a cry the old man staggers forward, and is greeted by the man he served as well and truly.

TIDYING UP PARIS.—The Commissioner of Works at Paris is greatly annoyed by the reports in the press, in which complaints of the untidiness of the streets are made. Angrily summoning the foreman, the Commissioner gives him instructions that the streets must in any circumstances be kept clean and tidy. Accordingly the foreman issues up his subordinates, and in a brief dozen of them, all armed with brooms, set about cleaning the streets. That performed they hand brooms decently low for stalls, barrows, lamposts, tramways, cycles, and all kinds of pedestrians are cleaned out of the streets of Paris. Satisfied of his work, the foreman dismisses his men, and with a polite bow, disappears.

Bess is in love with Bob, a cowboy, secretly engaged to her friend, and the two are often with the girls together. Inflamed with jealousy Art paints the character of his rival and also to secure Bess for himself. The foreman goes to the bank and Art poses Bob with liquor. He then leads up the brawny, and unwary Bob, who is innocently holding the lariat, tells him he has played a joke on the boys and they gallop away. After traveling a long distance they disappear, and Bob fails asleep, and Art makes his escape. The pursuing posse find Bob, and he convinces them of his innocence. Art is overtaken, and gets over a chasm hand over hand on a lariat. Bob follows and overpowers Art after a desperate struggle; just as the cowboys, who have made a detour, arrive on the scene.

THANHOUSER.

A WARTIME WOOING.—A Spanish nobleman, who resides on his large estate in Cuba, goes to fight for his country when war with the United States is declared. He is a widower and has only child, a daughter, remains home chafing, because she, too cannot go to the front.

The father is killed in one of the early battles, and his sad news friend brings his last message and his sword to the grief-stricken girl. She declares she will devote her life to vengeance, and as it is impossible for her to fight in the ranks she decides to become a spy.

Disguised as a dancing girl, she visits the public cafés where American officers are found, and picks up much information of value to her country.

On one occasion she meets a young lieutenant and despite her hatred of his cause is much attracted to him. He saves her from the unwelcome attentions of one of his comrades and escorts her home. But the girl knows that the lieutenant has papers that would be of value to her cause, and decides that duty is more important than love. She lures the young officer outside the lines and aids in bringing about his capture. She also aids the lieutenant to escape through a secret passage in her home, but he is seen, pursued and overpowered after a fight. But again the girl saves him, this time by the aid of the flag she once thought she despised.

A CIRCUS STOWAWAY.—Ted, a ting orphan, sees the first circus parade and is much impressed with it. So much so, in fact, that he follows the line of march to the "Big Tent," and manages to get a free ticket by helping to care for the animals. So he became a circus stowaway.

This is something that small boys frequently attempt but seldom "get away with." But Ted despite his youth, was resourceful. He hid in an empty animal wagon, and had a perfectly delightful sleepless, goose-flesh-raising ride to the next town. For he figured that perhaps a Royal Bengal tiger might come home at any moment and object to crowded quarters.

But nothing terrible happened except that the next day he was discovered and dragged from his place of refuge. The man who found him was about to spank him, and would have done so had it not been for a kindly circus rider, who came along, rescued him, beg him to his dressing room, fed him enough delightful circus sandwiches and put him to asleep on a pile of clothes in the corner.

Ted vowed that he would do anything in the world for the man who had been so kind to him, and his chance came shortly. For one of the ring attendants applied to for assistance in locating a missing heir to a large estate, laid a plot to sell, die the regretful heir out of his fortune.

He did not notice Ted, who was lying very quiet in the corner, but Ted did not miss a word, especially when he localized that it was his benefactor who was to be swindled. Ted forts the plot in a decidedly novel way, just when the wicked ring member and confederate was accomplice that victim was in their grasp. And Ted's benefactor never forgot that he owed his life of care and misery to the busy circus stowaway whom he had befriended out of pure good nature.

AMERICAN.

THE RANCH TENOR.—Wm. Steers fell in love with Young Widow Smith, whose ranch adjoined his own and, knowing that she was fond of music, organized a trio composed of his foreman, a Mexican cowboy and himself to serenade her.

The singing of the foreman irritated the widow and she abruptly stopped the vocal efforts of the trio with a bucket of cold water. The next day she wrote the rancheman that if he wanted to serenade her he should leave that "hum" tenor at home.

Although his foreman had been with him for years, he discharged him, employing in his place a young cowboy of remarkable vocal powers and with the new tenor, his next serenade was a musical triumph. The widow was highly pressed and as a mark of favor, gave him a rose and the trio returned home rejoicing. His happiness was short lived for the widow admired the new tenor and sent him a note to call upon her.

When Wm. Steers called to pay his respects to the fickle widow he found her in the arms of his new foreman. Mounting his horse he goes out to seek his old foreman, and comes upon his camp on the prairie. He finds ready sympathy when he tells his troubles to his old friend.

RATTLESNAKES AND GUNPOWDER.—The Sheriff of Kicking Gulch had long been enamored of the beautiful daughter of the hotel keeper and his suit was progressing favorably when an eastern drummer appeared in the Gulch and started paying marked attentions to the hotel-keeper's daughter. She was very favorably impressed and finding it difficult to choose between the two after their rival's tactless proposal decided to give them a test of bravery in order to win her hand.

The test consisted of thrusting an arm in a rattlesnake's hole and the drummer became panic stricken, for he knew that it meant almost certain death to obey the request. The Sheriff, however, knowing that rattlesnakes always avoid tobacco sprinkled the hole with tobacco from his pouch and thrust in his arm with impunity. Of course the lady chose the sheriff and left the crestfallen drummer to think it over.

Left to his own devices he discovers the trick played by the wily sheriff, and determines to even up the score. He effects an entrance to the general store and substitutes iron filings for the stock of giant powder.

New York City

The next day he appears at the store and makes a purchase of several pounds of his substituted giant powder. Returning to the hotel he reenters its lobby by sprinkling his powder on a paper and setting beside it with a lighted cigar in his mouth. The frightened spectators send for the sheriff to settle the mad man, and he now appears with his gun in hand, to arrest the dynamiter. The summer oddity lights a match and orders "Drop that gun or I'll drop this match," which he holds in close proximity to his fake powder. The sheriff is panic-stricken and turns in ignominious flight, and his fiancé to her fate. The fate in store for her however, is a complete revulsion of feeling and she decides that assistant will be better than soap bubbles.

CHAMPION.

THE PERIL OF DIAZ.—Arriving at the point of mobilization, we find all branches of the service—infantry and cavalry, machine gun and light artillery—in full campaign uniforms for inspection. Cavalry and Artillery are executing those intricate and thrilling Signal forms, galloping, wheeling and maneuvering, and wheeling in the various delicate formations in which United States troops are so ably drilled.

Then presuming that orders had been issued, we see Major Hughes engaged in building pontoon bridges across the river, bordering the field of action, for the crossing of regiments into the objective point. Then the mounted signal corps is seen as to momentarily deceive the spectator into thinking the motion is actual. The rapid firing of the military drills and the fine appearance of the Army excites respect and admiration.

Then, however, we view how the happy boys, partaking of their rations. Their healthy and hearty participation bear testimony to the solidification of the Government.

HOW HE REDEEMED HIMSELF.—Gerald Rodgers, the outlaw, applied for a job on the ranch of Ted Bovet, a square man and big hearted fellow. After a month's labor, Gerald went off to purchase a new outfit. Gerald fell temporarily from grace, when, having met some of his old companions.

But the old man had not lost faith in him, and at the time on his return, in spite of his daughter's pleadings for mercy and forgiveness for himself, he shot both Hal and Gerald, and would have killed the latter had not Ted's heart, she hid him in the stable.

To the stable came two robbers. They secreted themselves, having first decoyed the ranchman on the house by a fake letter from a confederate.

Upon his departure the strangers entered the house and leveled their guns at the girl. But Gerald was not there! He was in the stable, and the next moment, he had their hands up.

At this juncture the old man came in, and seeing Gerald's noble action raised in behalf of his child, at once seeing the outlaws, he covers him and frees, at the girl is quick, and like a flash throws up her fair arm and saves Gerald's life, thus turning the compliment he had paid her.

GREAT NORTHERN.

THE LOVE OF THE GYPSY GIRL.—A young chief is giving a dinner, and to amuse his guests, takes them to a gypsy encampment, where some of the gypsy girls dance to entertain the young chief. The chief is attracted by one of the gypsies, and falls in love with her. A little later the chief sees the court drive to his wedding with the daughter of a neighboring tribe-chief, and the gypsy girl sorrowfully to her own people. Five years elapse, and some gypsies call on the young chief in state with his wife and little daughter and he is fat alone. He sends them away angrily, and as in revenge, runs and kidnaps the child, who is taken to the gypsy encampment. The gypsy girl recognizes the child by the father's locket that she is wearing, and when the gypsies are asleep, she sneaks out intending to return the child to its parents. The gypsies pursue, but the girl with great courage and safety reaches the chief's estate. She finds the sorrowing parents of the child filled with contrition and assured that the woman he has wronged has returned and for evil.

YANKEE.

HIS ROMANCE.—A young student is visiting the east and while climbing the rocks losing his fishing rod falls from an immense height. He is rescued by wood cutters but is unconscious. A rocks, where he is found by a young fisher and who goes for help and he is carried to her home and nursed for.

Her girl is loved by a young fisherman in a with his young student is able to be about and acquainted of the girl's kind nature and of her with a ring. As the young student comes the girl sadly, how for him has awakened in her true to her young fisherman lover and runs the ring to the student. The young student sees the girl's feelings and with a last look through the window where the girl and her lover seated, he turns away to face the city life.

THE BIRTH MARK.—George Raven, and his fe. Polly, with their infant son, Ned, are living happily in a little town in England. Duke Norman, a friend of theirs often calls, and has lengthy chats. One day, while he is looking at their child's wonderful birth mark Raven, who is peering in at a window, assumes that he is trespassing and fires a shot at him.

So Polly decides to go to America, and takes her baby boy with her. George receiving his fatal wounds is off in search of his native child and the Judge. Arriving in America and after spending many days in a fruitless search, he drifts into the Canadian Northwest, and establishes a fine Royal Mounted Police.

In the meantime Polly secures a divorce and marries the Duke. The infant has grown into manhood, and has formed an attachment for Mattie Hudson.

One day an Indian approaches the Duke, who has been drinking heavily. He is interested when he learns he is the "Red Man" from revengeance. Not so very long after this occurrence he has a chance to shoot the Duke while he dies. Not to be found and obliged to seek refuge in Canada.

The sheriff learns of Ned's flight, and writes his description to the Royal Police. Raven is decided to be the job.

In the course of time Raven captures Ned, but as his second term of enrolment had expired before he was consigned to capturing him he does not bring the victim back to be hanged. So he sends a letter to his commander stating that as his term had expired he refused to be hanged.

The Indian makes a full confession of the shooting and Raven and his wife are brought together again. The Duke having died.

BULLETIN 31 YOURS FOR THE ASKING

GARDEN CITY FAN CO.
ESTABLISHED 1879 Manufacturers McCormick Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

We have moved to new spacious quarters and are ready to offer machines and machine parts, stereopticon lamps, carbon-arms, lenses, condensers, carbons, tickets, cloths, slats, in fact everything pertaining to an up-to-date and complete equipment of a moving-picture theatre.
We also buy all kinds of second-hand machines.

COMPENSARC

This Machine cuts 2/3 from your Light Bills

Mr. Manager

If you are on a 110 or 220 volt circuit and you are using a rheostat to reduce the voltage to 35 at the arc in your lamp, you are paying for =, more "juice" than you are actually using. Can you afford to waste all this energy supplied from the line, over and above what you really need?

The Fort Wayne Compensarc saves all this waste by reducing the voltage without losing any: makes a clearer, whiter, steadier light, and eliminates all danger of fires caused by overheated rheostats.

We have a little 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat" that we want to send you. It will tell you plainly how you can make a big saving and a better light. Send us your name and address.

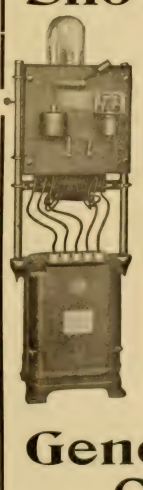
How Do You Show Pictures?



Do you want your theatre to gain a reputation for the clearest and brightest pictures?

Do you want to lessen your current bills?

Pertinent questions that mean dollars to you and solved to your utmost satisfaction by the installation of a

Mercury Arc Rectifier

This device changes alternating current into direct current at a lower cost than by any other method. It gives a strong, white, non-flickering light—consequently a better showing of pictures and therefore increased patronage.

In a nutshell—Big increase in receipts. Big increase in light. Saving in current.

The G. E. Rectifier occupies a floor space of only 18 inches square. It has no moving parts to get out of order and operates without attention.

This is worth looking into. Find out all about this remarkable device. Mail the coupon today or 'phone our nearest office for full particulars.

MOTORING

is that ideal brand of comedy that teaches that you can make people laugh without the aid of slapstick. Real wit in a story, and real cleverness in the picture-construction of it, obviate the need of all slapstick. That is made clear here. The picture is merely logical, and that's what will make you like it. The motorist wins a wife in an intensely funny way, but a mighty logical one. And on the Same Reel

Superior Plays.

The Important Elements of Their Construction.

BY LOUIS REEVES HARRISON.

We are told that the public cannot be educated, but this statement is flatly contradicted by abundant evidence that the public is being educated, especially in the ten thousand little theaters exhibiting moving pictures. On the fact that good taste in the pictural drama is being elevated by every masterly production shown rests our hope for the future of the photoplay. Those who are catering to limited intelligence in this form of entertainment, with a view to pleasing a small proportion of the audience, are harming the exhibitor more than they can possibly realize. Inferior plays antagonize the regular patrons, the ones who can best afford to go elsewhere to be amused if the performance is of low quality while, on the other hand, poor plays are harder to understand than good ones, and what is satisfactory to a discriminating audience often reaches slow minds through the emotions. Notable illustration of this was the keen appreciation shown by an East Side audience of Maeterlinck's mystical "Blue Bird," whose real purport was not grasped by all the high-class supporters of The New Theater.

Neither the exhibitor nor the general public nor the director nor any one concerned is benefited by playlets of the "good-enough-for-them-they-don't-know-any-better" kind. These are sanctioned by men who are too small for the business they are in, lucky accidents are they, whose heads have become inflated without any corresponding increase of gray matter. They would be swiftly eliminated in open competition, but are safely entrenched behind men of real brains under existing business organization, and we are facing a condition, not a theory. Between these and the leading producers are men who do not think they know it all and are making serious efforts to constantly improve the quality of their plays, or at least to enlist the services of directors who are progressive, but few directors can evolve a creditable presentation from poor raw material, and the best of them find it difficult to get the scenarios they want for two good reasons.

First, the average amount paid is too low.

Second, good judges of plays do not grow on every bush.

The first obstacle will be overcome when business men realize that $50 is not too much for a play costing $500 expenditure to produce.

The second obstacle is being removed by playwrights and scenario editors themselves whenever and wherever their efforts are accorded recognition and encouragment. I was told the other day that Frohman would gladly pay a million dollars for the services of an individual of unerring judgment in the matter of stage productions, but I think this statement is slightly exaggerated. Our need is not so much of critics as of dramatists who understand their business; in fact, I happen to personally know a Frohman agent, a woman, who has picked winner after winner for no other reward than her regular commission. Her method is so effective that I give what I know of it for the benefit of those engaged in the selecting of photoplays, simply in the way of suggestion, to be used or not as they may seem fit. In studying screen productions on my own account, it has seemed to me that the methods of Frohman's agent apply because she does not tie herself to this or that dramatic essential, but arranges them in order of consequence and takes a broad and comprehensive view of the whole.

IDEA

Most important of the essentials is the idea. What is the meaning of the story?

A drama is merely a story put into action. If it consists of a series of incidents strung together on the thread of a plot, with some opportunity for the actor and the scene painter, it may be called a drama, but all pleasurable illusion for those who sit in front will be dispelled by the artificiality and obvious straining for effect which sickened people of the stage production before that on the screen became so popular. It is right to use all the scenic resources, ingenious or artistic ,which fit the presentation and enhance its value, but it is a mistake to let them dominate the underlying motive. The audience is interested in the story itself and only appreciates the pains taken to tell it when no exaggeration becomes apparent. While an expert might be interested in the paint used or the method employed in making a picture, only its purpose attracts the attention of the mass. From the time tales were handed down by word of mouth from generation to generation, story telling has risen in quality until it has become a great vehicle of thought transference among enlightened men and women. One of us stimulates the others with ideas that awaken new inspirations or brighten ordinary days of uneventful lives. I came across a fragment of criticism the other day to the effect that "An Aching Void," released during the winter by the Vitagraph Company, was the best thing they had done in many and many a day, though the plot contained neither novelty of situation, thrill of suspense, nor originality of incident. The statement was accurate; that it was almost without action, yet the play went over while others stayed flat on the screen. There was no plot construction.

CHARACTERIZATION

Next in importance is characterization.

It was suggested in "The Little Major" (Rex Company), that a human soul fluttering on the threshold of death could be called back by the voice of a loved one, but it might have seemed improbable that a child could accomplish this marvel had not the early scenes been devoted to showing that he was a boy of originality and determination whose one grand passion was a fanatical devotion to his mother. These characteristics were delicately, rather than strongly, conveyed by the child's conduct in play and in natural fondness for the idol of his heart. Here was a brave and earnest little character whose thoughtfulness and direct simplicity of purpose was so brought out that, when the crisis was reached, the boy's strenuous effort became a natural one from the point of view of the audience.

In trying to show the splendid fortitude of American women during the bitter Civil War, I selected the southern type because the after-burden of misery fell heavier on our brothers and sisters of the lost cause. "A Dixie Mother" (Vitagraph), to be effective and representative, was a characterization intensified by every incident and situation in the opening scenes of the play. They were all devised for the sole purpose of displaying her mental powers of endurance and patient courage under affliction. The characterization dominated all else in the play. This made her subsequent mental struggle the more effective, and caused the audiences to cry and think, then smile through their tears.

SITUATION

Third in value is the situation.

This is of great consequence in all forms of comedy; still it is best when it makes us laugh and think. "Mother Love" (Imp release) was intended to be a tragi-comedy based on the peculiar situation of a young married couple when the wife, in a condition of lapsed memory caused by affliction, reverted to a girlhood period before she had met her husband and believed herself to be unmarried. It was a trying situation for the husband and for the young clergyman she elected to prefer and an exciting one for the audience because there was no relief in sight. The situation in this case awakened profound sympathy and created a condition of high suspense not broken until the problem of restoring the young wife's mental balance had been solved by desperate measures. The great difficulty of presenting plays which, depending upon situation alone, lies in the rarity of events suited to dramatic high tension. It does not seem wise to let a feverish craving for that sort of composition dominate when there is so much that is comic or tragic in what is going on around us. Human life is a larger thing than the play. Playwright, director and actor must recognize this and lean more to the human than to the theatrical side of the story.

The individual in the audience will tell us that he does not pretend to know anything about dramatic criticism, but he knows what he likes. Why does he buy an advertised article instead of one having the cost of advertising put into quality? Is it because he is told what is good? That same individual might better enjoy an article of quality if its merits were pointed out to him by one who knew the difference. There is a great deal in literature, art and the drama that we might not understand and enjoy if our comprehension was narrowed to our own point of view. I do not think any honest critic sets himself up as infallible—none of us are that,—but opera, novel, picture or play is the result of certain forces on which the light of investigation is constantly being thrown; otherwise it would be an eternal case of O = O for all of us. To criticism we owe the advance, if not the variety and charm, of much that we enjoy. Honest and intelligent criticism not only serves to enlarge the mental scope of the onlooker, but acts as a stimulus to finer effort on the part of those who may not relish its bitter, tonic flavor, but need it after over-indulgence in the sweets of fawning flattery.

Of false grounds taken by critics none is more common than that of realism. There are dramatic moments in all lives, but to group and intensify these within the limits of a pictured story is not realism, but its artful semblance. Then what may not seem possible to one individual of minute personal experience may have actually occurred in the lives of thousands. It may be of value to speak of the artistic settings or of the selection of natural scenes in the encouragement of good taste, but the photography is a mechanical question largely solved by the use of suitable materials. The photoplay at this stage of the game is supposed to be mechanically correct to come within the reach of higher criticism. Mention of the personalities behind the pictured story seldom reaches those who see it from in front, and is better suited to special articles; so we find ourselves confined to the quality of the production as a whole in critical revision.

We must consider the audience.

Nearly all of us go to the theater to be taken away from ourselves and the dull routine of our own lives for a glimpse of what may stir us, enliven us or charm us in the lives of others. We want to be tickled, to have our sympathies stirred or to have our souls quickened by some splendid thought.

What is the idea of the story? Are its people so presented as to be interesting? Do its situations appeal to us? The chances are that we will be interested if all these essentials are taken care of in the presentation.

If the idea is purely educational in the way of art, history or travel it may rest on that value alone in some cases, but I should prefer an entertaining historical play, with strong characterization of at least one central figure with stirring or enlivening incidents. The idea may be to rouse new interest in the great human stories of the Bible, or to point the finger of scorn at wrong and injustice, or to indicate the unnamed rewards of labor; it may be patriotic, socialistic, public-spirited, humanitarian; it may be to cheer, enliven or strengthen us, but it seems to me that a play utterly devoid of an idea of some sort is much like a life without a purpose—hardly worth while.

The play worth while, like the man worth while, stands for something. If the play stands for nothing, the effect on the audience is a blank or dumb wonder why time, effort and money should be expended on it. We all know that photoplays are being shown every day in the week which are neither entertaining nor instructive, which have no reason for existence. How, then, are they to be eliminated and better material substituted except through the medium of criticism. Is it better for all concerned that they should be continued? Should they be corrected? Is not the best method of improving the average quality that of appreciating generously the superior productions? What do you think about it?

Discrediting the Uniform.

Our New England scribe has written us at some length concerning the action of two picture houses in Portsmouth, N. H., in barring from their performances anyone who wears the uniform of the United States Navy. Our views do not exactly coincide with those of our Boston correspondent.

Portsmouth is a United States Naval Station. There are many "Jackies" stationed there; also marines and officers. From what we know of Portsmouth, "Jackies" in that town are the same as they are in other stations. They like to have a good time, and once in a while they are likely to "clean out" some place or other. Sometimes it is a gin-mill that is cleaned out by blue-jackets. Other times it may be a house of ill-fame, or a dance-hall or some sailors' restaurant, and, perhaps in later days, there may have been a few moving picture shows "cleaned out," but not any that we know of. One thing that protects the moving picture theater from the outward manifestations of naval discontentment is the fact that moving pictures level all ranks. They hold the interest, and very little disorder is ever recorded while the photoplay is on.

As a rule, at a moving picture show proper, Sailor Jack is just as quiet and contented as any landsman, even though he be there in numbers. There is no need to subdue him. We have already heard from the Philippines that the savage tribes of head-hunters there have forgotten their time-honored occupation of decapitation, and in its stead have acquired the moving picture craze. Armies have been trying for a hundred years to subdue the head-hunters, and where armies have failed during all those years, the moving picture stepped in and brought them out of savagery over night. The reason is that the moving picture holds the interest all the time. It will also be seen, therefore, that if the moving picture will soothe the savage heart, there is no real reason for considering Sailor Jack a hopeless case.

There is no fear of a "rough-house" where pictures by themselves are shown. Vaudeville is the red flag that starts Jack on his crusade. He is accustomed to the "Honky Tonk," more prevalent in the West than in the East. The kind of vaudeville that he sees at the moving picture show is about on the same level with that which he has been seeing in beer gardens, where faded beauty in threadbare voice first sings to him, then sits and has a drink with him. Sailor Jack knows at once what he likes and what he dislikes. He considers it his duty to express outwardly just exactly how he feels within. If he does not like a female upon the stage he makes it known in no faint or uncertain way. On the other hand, when he is smitten with her talent, he is appreciative in the same manner, as we know, by the pounding of his beer glass upon the table.

One way to keep trouble out of a theatre is not to admit it in the first place. In a town like Portsmouth, when the manager sees on the horizon a squad of blue-jackets bearing down upon his place, the barometer of past experiences is the only thing that can guide him as to the portent of the oncoming sea-dogs. It is not a case of "Who goes there?—Friend or foe?—Give the countersign," etc. The manager has reason to know in advance whether they are friend or foe, and therefore one cannot blame a manager in Portsmouth or any other place for using his discretionary powers, whether it involves the livery of Uncle Sam or Johnny Bull or anybody else.

Our old friend Tom Sharkey is perhaps the greatest living exponent of the "rough house" sailor. It is often told of him and his shipmates how they came ashore to attend a prize fight in San Francisco at which the mighty Tom was to defend the honor of the United States Navy, and it is needless to say that they were with him to a man. On the way back from the fights, which Tom usually won, this mob of sailors would "clean up" everything along the line, and if there were any picture houses in those days, in all probability they got theirs along with the rest. In this case we are only dragging in Tom's past history as an example. Sailors are not always so rough as he was, but the incident will serve to show that the "rough-house" germ is present to a greater or less extent in every squad of sailors.

Sailors are no different from any other body of husky young men in search of amusement. Education or environment play no part in the matter. The same applies to college students as much as it does to the Army or Navy. A while ago there was a picture theatre in New Haven as completely wrecked by college students as any batallion of Marines could ever have done it. The only uniform they wore was a little hat with a half-inch brim and a colored ribbon around it, held in place by slitted straps. Some of them wore baggy trousers, turned up at the bottoms, short coats like bell-boys, and possibly a bull-dog pipe in their mouths.

Now, if the owner of that theatre had seen that squad of college Willies (?) in the uniform of dear old Yale approaching on the horizon, the same as that manager up in Portsmouth saw the squad of Jackies coming, and in the same manner had smelled trouble, he would have followed the same course. He would have said, "I know that I am disparaging the blue flag of Old Eli boys, but you can't come in." Just as the Portsmouth manager probably said, "I may be casting asparagus on Uncle Sam, my hearties, but you can't come in."

The difference is this: The New Haven manager let the bunch in and lost his place; the Portsmouth manager kept them out and is still running.

Moral: Some people are brave in a crowd. The bigger the crowd, the braver they are.

Not Guilty.

The American Federation of Catholic Societies has sent broadcast to the leading theatrical producers throughout the country an open letter deploring plays that have been produced upon the stage which mocked at sacred things and moral principles which the Christian holds in highest respect. Says this document:

"We deplore still more deeply that these plays of first class [Note the first class.—Ed.] houses soon find their way into cheaper amusement places, nickelodeons, vaudevilles, moving picture shows, and thus reach out to our American youths and children. Plays as objectionable as 'Miss Innocence,' 'Desperate Chance,' 'The Hypocrites,' 'Kreutzer Sonata' and 'Sapho,'" etc., etc.

The Secretary of the Federation of Catholic Societies has requested us to give publicity to the above mentioned open letter in our columns, which we regret on account of its length, we cannot do. However, by way of comment as per request, we can say Not Guilty, so far as the moving picture is concerned. This circular mentions plays like "Salome," "The Blue Mouse," "The Soul Kiss," "The Girl from Rectors," "The Easiest Way," "The Girl in the Train," "The Girl in the East," "Alma Wo Wohnst Du," "La Samaritaine," etc. In all this indictment of salacious plays that are acted on the stage with impunity anywhere in America, we fail to find the name of a single moving picture. We would like to know why the words "Nickelodeon" and "moving picture show" were dragged into this open letter, when there is nothing definite to show their connection with it.

The open letter, so far as moving pictures are concerned, is nothing but a generality. We do not know of any of the above plays that have been done in moving picture form, therefore why should the American Federation of Catholic Societies deplore still more deeply that these plays of first class (?) houses soon find their way into cheaper amusement places, nickelodeon, vaudevilles and moving picture shows and thus reach out to our American youths and children?"

The shoe does not fit, so we will hand it back with the request that the American Federation of Catholic Societies look out for a umbrella in the first class theater it speaks of, and not go to the moving picture show.

Our only regret in connection with this open letter of the Catholic Societies is that the moving picture is again dragged into the limelight by force of habit and ignorant prejudice. There is nothing to show that the moving picture is guilty of any of the above misdemeanors, and, in our opinion, the American Federation of Catholic Societies is in the position of a blind man leading another blind man, and thereby have done an injustice to the moving picture which has been done many times before by those who have not seen what they are denouncing.

Cheaper Electricity in New York.

The New York Edison Company is announcing a reduction in its rates for electric illumination and power. It is carrying large half-page advertisements in the daily newspapers announcing that fact. One of the advertisements begins as follows: "The New York Edison Company takes pleasure in announcing to the public, etc., etc." Of course our readers will readily believe that the Edison Company is taking great pleasure in announcing such facts. We can almost see its pleasure by imagination. According to the advertisement, the company are all smiles, but we must not forget the old adage, "There's many a smiling face that hides an aching heart."

For the better understanding of the reader, perhaps it would be well to reprint the new general schedule:

The first	250 K W Hrs. of monthly consumption at	10c
Next	250 " " " " " " "	9c
"	250 " " " " " " "	8c
"	250 " " " " " " "	7c
Excess over	1500 " " " " "	for the excess, at 5c

The reader will notice that it grades from ten cents per K.W. hour down to five cents, at intervals of 250 K.W. hours per jump. By the time we get to 1500 K.W. hours, we find it is cheaper to buy electricity than to make it. That fact is most patent of any as we glance over this sliding scale. For instance: We have in a small store adjoining a large office building, a small Italian hat cleaner. The Italian hat cleaner is obliged to pay twice as much for his current as the office building next door, although they both get it from the same feed wire. There is no given reason for this in the well-worded advertisements of the Edison Company, but the real reason is that there is no danger of the small Italian hat cleaner putting in an electric plant of his own. Perhaps he has not the money to do it, or even if he did have, it would not pay him to do so, therefore he has to pay ten cents. But the large office building is another matter. Its owners have money, and no doubt can put in a lighting plant of their own if the Edison Company doesn't do things to suit them; hence the Edison Company advertises this low rate to the large consumer.

The whole gist of the Edison advertisement is to discourage the installation of isolated plants. There can be no other construction put upon it when one glances over the above table, especially as the current comes over the same feed wire from the same power house for all parties along the line. The New York Edison Company is a heavy advertiser. It spends money with a lavish hand to induce the consumer to believe its service is the best and cheapest. As every one knows, the Edison Company is a monopoly, therefore one might ask, "Why should a monopoly advertise?" The answer is simple: In order that the large consumer will not learn how cheap electricity really is, and put in his own plant.

The wording of this latest Edison advertisement, emphasizing its desire to serve the public faithfully, and the pleasure which it seems to take in announcing the reduction in rates, etc., etc., does not read well when placed alongside the facts of the lawsuit of the Brooklyn exhibitor whom we mentioned editorially in these columns in the issue of May 6th. In our other editorial we noted the high-handed arrogance of the Edison Company in dealing with the single individual. Now we observe it, as its advertising cuts show it, a public servant dressed in a butler's uniform bearing an electric light upon a tray, like a lackey serving liquors to his betters. It is this new advertising that brings the matter again to mind. Our readers will no doubt remember that in our recent editorial, we called attention to the fact that the isolated plant was a thorn in the side of all public service corporations, and we now see the truth of that statement borne out in these advertisements announcing big reductions in rates for the large consumer who, in parenthesis, is perhaps becoming more partial to the isolated plant to an extent alarming to the Edison Company. Exhibitors are requested to take note, because the foregoing applies to many cities besides New York, and it is well for all moving picture men to become better posted on what can be done in the way of an isolated plant.

Faust by Pathe

A finely colored and beautifully acted art film, like the newest achievement (Faust) of the Pathe Company, must surely cause some stir among exhibitors. The story of Faust is one of the most popular of those great tales that have been handed down from so far back that to trace out its roots seems well nigh impossible. Its popularity perhaps comes from the fact that it illustrates a very perplexing truth of life—the prosperity of evildoers.

This version of the story closely follows the famous opera. It was shown to a few newspaper men in the Pathe studio this week. It opens with a scene in Faust's study. He is an old man, and shows that he is in despair, for he has searched science in vain for truth. Mephistopheles appears just in time to keep him from drinking the poison he has prepared. The appearance and the disappearance of this Demon, who comes and goes in a wink, always takes place in a flash of fiery smoke. It is cleverly accomplished and gives, as far as possible, an uncanny touch to his work. It explains his evil influence over Marguerite. In the second scene, Mephistopheles, in such a flash, changes himself into a dog, which follows the old philosopher out to the town and seems to be an evil influence presiding over his meeting with Marguerite. In this act, when he returns to his study, the fall of Faust is accomplished. He reddens a quill in his wrist and signs the pact that in the last scene costs him his soul, while the angel Michael saves that of Marguerite.

One of the most notable scenes in the picture is where the Demon takes the old Faust to the witch's cavern. The mysterious caldron is boiling at one side. The old hag adds something to it and the smoke rises up in volume. Then she ladles out a cup of the beverage for the old philosopher and he drinks. The Demon waves his cloak before the graybeard, and when it falls we see a very handsome youth. This new Faust then begins his pursuit of Marguerite, which ends in the death of her brother, her madness and the tragic scene in the prison which ends the story.

A Word to the Producer.

By Robert Grau.

In a previous article in this periodical I ventured to prophesy that the day was not far off when the incongruous "explanations," as amplified in the transcription on the screen of letters and telegrams for the purpose of clarifying in the spectator's mind the plot of the photoplay, would be rendered unnecessary, and that progress and science would combine to offer a more worthy substitute, so that the verity of the portrayals would be emphasized.

Of course this can be achieved to a great extent through an absolutely clear and concrete picture, and whether my suggestion had aught to do with it or not, the fact remains that in the film "Pygmalion and Galatea" the producer, Mr. Francis A. Powers, exacted from the members of the cast a complete and literal utterance of the lines, with a result that left no doubt as to the success of the effort to "put over" the beautiful story of this great work. It is true that plays such as this one are tolerably familiar to the average playgoer, but in the instance of which I write, the whole recital came to the audience much as a novelty, and the impression created was decidedly favorable.

While on this subject of clarity, I would like to pay a little tribute to the master mind whose province it is to stage the photoplays for the Thanhouser Company, particularly the film "Not Guilty," in which the attention to detail raised the production almost to a state of art. Even in so seemingly insignificant a matter as the photographing of a newspaper on the screen to call attention to the confession of the real criminal, the verity of the whole was lifted almost to an actuality by a perfect reproduction of the New York Tribune. I was unable to discern in the few seconds the effect was on view, what means were taken to create the illusion, but it is just such perfection in details that has given David Belasco his great fame, and it is indeed consoling to know that the producers of photoplays are aspiring to reach great heights in such matters.

In the film "The Other Man," the effort made by the Nestor Company's producer to achieve the effect of an actuality met with a result so convincing that the sacrificing of a great situation in the finale or climax, when the burglar is permitted to escape, surprised me; perhaps this was due to a desire not to give too much "meat" in one film, for in the last moment of the production, and in a single picture, four distinct surprises were revealed.

It is not in my province to dwell on the comparative merits of the different films, and even if it was, having been brought up in the school which proclaims "comparison is not criticism," would make me reluctant to do so, but there is perhaps no better time or place for me to state that, though it may be just a coincidence or perhaps a temporary accident, nevertheless the productions of photoplays that have impressed me most have been put forth by the coterie operating under the name of "Independents."

Some of the larger companies seem to be wholly lacking in prolific material; a resort to plays and operas familiar to the general public is a procedure, in my humble opinion, that threatens the very structure on which the art of cinematography has had its foundation, for seventy-five per cent. of the success in this field has been due to the almost perfect emulation of actuality; hence, if conditions are such that the public is invited to witness plays and operas, the plots of which are known to them, it is evidence in plenty that the fictional phase of the latter will become a menace to the exhibitors in their contest with the theatre managers on a problem wherein they have heretofore won, and the "Independents" are still winning, by evolving productions replete with realism and apparent truth.

If one may not find material that is new, sufficient for the purposes, then why not a resort to that which is "old enough to be new" plays like "Under the Gaslight," "Griffith Gaunt," "No Thoroughfare," "Led Astray," "Rose Michel, "Daniel Rochat," and a hundred others lend themselves readily to the laws of cinematography. Moreover, they can be purchased for fifteen cents at Brentano's, and as evidence that a public is responsive to such works, one need only go to the Lyric Theatre and see the crowds packing that playhouse night after night to see "The Lights o' London," just as they did a year ago to see "Jim the Penman" at the same house, and also to the Empire Theatre to see Robertson's old comedy, "Caste."

The public does not patronize the picture theatre because it is cheap—this is something I am certain about; the majority go to a picture theatre for the same reasons that I do, because the eye is appealed to, and because pantomime is the most potent of all the arts of entertaining.

Oh, ye producers! It is not for me to offer you advice, but if there be amongst you any that hold my views in respect, I have just one suggestion to make at this time: in your quest for stage material compelling enough for film production, do not overlook the many splendid vehicles available to you in the fifteen-cent books. The public side-tracked inferior melodrama, and turned to the picture theatre for relief. If it is necessary to draw on the theatre for your amunition, you can do so and still preserve the laws of realism and verity, but failure awaits him who endeavors to avail himself of fiction familiar to modern picture theater-goers. Nothing is surer than that the day a resort to this becomes necessary, that day will see the beginning of a decline in the vogue of the picture theatre itself.

An Exquisite Nature Picture.

We reviewers have used the word beautiful so much and desecrated it so much that when the true occasion comes we haven't any word to use, for beautiful has no meaning. In describing his impression of the latest picture from the Ambrosio Company, this reviewer will try not to use that word.

The pcture tells of the perennial struggle of spring and winter; of warm days that are followed by cold; of white snowflakes falling on pink blossoms. Snowdrop, in the first scene of this picture, stands in floating white veils dreaming and scattering big white flakes one by one. Behind her, under a huge Alpine rock, sits Winter with a snowy beard, asleep. Only a glimpse of Snowdrop's dream is given; it is a little heart-shaped picture of shepherds and girls dancing around a flowering tree.

Winter now realizes that Snowdrop is in danger, and he gives her for safe keeping to the King of Woods, whose gnomes bind her around with ivy and imprison her in a rocky cavern. These scenes are all Alpine, with glaciers and deep snowbanks for setting. The gnomes fall asleep and Snowdrop tip-toes past and stands at the mouth of the cave. She waves her hands and a shower of real snow falls, snow that melts. As a picture, it is exquisitely poetical.

Snowdrop wanders down into the valley where it is thawing, and falls in love with a bright-faced youth, Spring-Blossom. He leads her to the shepherd's festival. As she comes it begins to snow and the shepherds are angry, but Spring-Blossom protects Snowdrop and, as they go away together, the sun shines again and the shepherds continue the dance. But, of course though snow proves the buds from the cold winds of early spring, Spring-Blossom finds Snowdrop a chilly welcome and he goes into the house of warm days and sits at the hearth of summertime. Snowdrop, in love with him, attempts to warm her hands at the same fire. She is stung and quickly draws back, but it is too late. The thaw-warmth has benumbed her and she falls in a heap, melting away. Above her, as though she were the soul of Snowdrop, stands a flower-garbed and blossom-crowned girl whom Spring Blossom takes in his arms.

This is a film worthily ardent commendation. The idea is so fine and it is produced in such an artistic way that one can find no fault with it. The scenes, taken in winter in the Alps or Appenines perhaps, must have tried the patience of pretty Snowdrop, for she was a mortal woman and her arms were bare. No one but a poet could have conceived of these pictures; no one but an artist could have produced them. They will please everyone. There isn't an audience that will take them amiss.

The Unnatural Scene.

C. H. Claudy.

When a kid joins a college fraternity the less friends he has in it the better off he is, so I have heard.

When a man joins the Mystic Shrine the fewer heathen within the Temple can call him by name, the easier he gets by—so I know.

With the same motive which leads us to delight in torturing our friends, I now prepare me to jump hard, and with both feet, upon Vitagraph. It's so seldom one gets a really good chance. They are altogether too clever—these Vitagraph people—get up so many beautiful and heart-touching little plays, so many interesting scenes, have so capable a company, and are altogether so sure-fire—that when they do make a break, it causes their friends—of which I am one, ardent one—to wonder why.

The particular case in point is "The Show Girl," in which the stage manager (or the producer, or whoever bosses the job) fell asleep and permitted the course of events in front of the camera to so shape themselves that several distinctly unbelievable and very unnatural scenes resulted—and this, in a company which usually does everything possible to make her settings of scene, both setting and action—as there—fore the more pronounced. In "The Show Girl" a stage is shown from the wings, with dancers dancing upon it, in front of the audience—a regular performance going on. Now stop and think, you who read, and tell me—have you ever, in a real theater, under any circumstances whatever, seen an actress receive a bunch of flowers, start, turn her shoulder to the audience, pause in startled thought, grab a note from the flowers, turn more shoulder, kick not, start across the stage away from the wings, and be recalled to her proper part by a fellow performer? You have not. I have not. I doubt it has ever been done. There is too much professional pride and stage tradition, not to mention the possibility of a severe row by the manager, to permit such an exhibition except possible at least to permit it being probable.

Next, did you ever go to an eye specialist? Did you ever see an eye specialist's office? Did you ever hear of one, worth his salt, who would permit his wife—or anyone—to come into said office on a household errand, while he was examining a patient? Can you imagine an eye specialist stopping his examination, while talking with his wife, leaving his patient stranded in operating chair? I doubt it. Worse and worse, do the eye specialists you know have their office and their waiting room in one? Are patients usually admitted to the consulting and operating room by a maid, to await the doctor, and permitted to look over the tools of the trade while said doctor is being hunted up? Not usually, you will agree. Nor Vitagraph permits all these things. Wifey comes in while patient is in chair, interrupts Doctor leaves patient. Later, when chorus girl heroine comes to doctor's to see him, maid takes her for patient, leads her to operating room or office, leaves her to hunt up doctor. Finally, while chorus lady is pretending to be patient, to two wives, wifey comes in all aglow with delight on account of goods she thinks Doctor Husband has sent her, and, utterly regardless of supposed patient, does a love match with doctor, who forgets to play his part and permits supposed patient to replace in chair and finally get up and leave, unseen. And to complete their tale of sins, Vitagraph has a closing scene with a horrible lighting of midnight and spot light, for which no one understands the reason, and in which there is nothing told.

Sally has revived that good old rank drama, the "Still Alarm," and revived it to most-the-extent. It probably isn't my-a fault that the drama (also by a couple of breaks, which these keen faithfully reproduced, also, of course, is the unparalleled theatrical apparatus in the fire engine house, open at all times to point to and smash as fire was sweet will, in the middle of the day. Also the several wires to the apparatus which are carefully run through a box for the express purpose of being easily cut. I remember the same convenient arrangement when I saw the show on the stage, years ago.

No one knows how they get the "still" alarm—they just find the cut wires and haul out the apparatus and find the fire by intuition, as far as anything you see on the screen goes. But what matter? The fire scene is most excellent—it's a real fire department and they make a fine run, and do some fine work with ladders and hose. Of course, the unduly critical, like myself, wonder why there was already a ladder conveniently placed against a shed, and why, if it wasn't good enough for the firemen to go up, it was the most inconvenient for them to come down, bearing unconscious bodies in their arms. One also wonders why it takes four men to one hose to squirt water against a brick wall, and one can criticize the lack of action of many firemen while comrades are struggling, single handed, with rescued and unconscious people—but there! The interior, burning, was most excellently done, the fire engines were real, and the good old hair raiser raised hair as of yore, and I'd much rather see it again (I saw it twice) than some other things I am going to walk upon.

So I dip these typewriter keys in vitriol for Champion and oil of roses for Imp, and proceed to berate the one and bless the other for having released, at near the same time, two war plays, which I had the good fortune to see one after the other at the same house. Champion's is called "With Sheridan at Murfreesboro," although it might be anywhere else just as well, since all the action is in the studio. The plot is all right—probably could easily have happened, and, handled as Imp handled theirs in "The Forged Dispatch," would have been as good a play as theirs was. But Champion didn't want to go to the expense or trouble to stage a war play in the open, so they had everything interiors and battlefields, camps and bedside scenes, right in the convenient studio, and when you try to put all outdoors before an audience by means of a background painted in smeary imitation of trees and shrubbery, you fail. Champion failed, and the result was an extremely unnatural play, without a line of conviction in it. And when it came to the little skirmish, in which half a dozen Southern and half a dozen Northern soldiers squatted as far away from each other as they could, behind convenient bushes, so that only the muzzles of their rifles showed, and then carefully and all at once fired up in the air (it wouldn't do to scorch each other, you know!) and there was no one hurt, why no one in the audience was either surprised or particularly impressed—certainly not yours truly, who wants, for his nickel, as much naturalness as he can get.

As for Imp and the "Forged Dispatch," the story is also at least probable, and the action is fine, the plot logically worked out, and the battle scene, the bursting shell—in fact, all the outdoor scenes are excellent in both technique, photography, acting and general effect. There was no great bother about the battle scene—it was just a skirmish—just an incident and not the main thing in the play. And the finding of the forged order, years after, the vindication of the disgraced hero on Decoration Day, before his old comrades, and by help of his lost love, was prettily conceived and well done—and there was no ranting in the whole thing, and no interiors painted to look like outdoors. Well done, Imp—do it again!

Reliance is responsible for an anachronism or so in "Over the Shading Edge," in which, however, they had precedent. I suppose that it is natural that the conditions of the stage should be followed out in the moving picture play. Yet the stagy idea of a newspaper reporter, a newspaper plant, a newspaper city room, and the way things are conducted in a newspaper has been revised of late years—but Reliance sticks to the old tradition, following Edison when that company produced a garbled and not particularly impressive version of Richard Harding Davis's story of Gallagher.

In Gallagher, you may remember, there are reporters and a white mustached newspaper editor, who gesticulate, grab 'phones as if they were long lost brothers, smite fists into palms at the thought of a "story," tear hair and otherwise comport themselves as if newspaper work was a whirl of excitement. Present Scribe owns having been in the business for a good many years, to have inhabited more than one city room, and been all kinds of a reporter except a good one, but he has never yet seen a newspaper staff get excited before the paper was out, show any emotion over anything except a poker game, and has met but few newspaper men but what made it a point of pride not to be surprised, not to show great interest or excitement, and not to lose control of themselves. In Gallagher we looked at make-believe newspaper men, and make-believe newspaper work. In "Over the Shading Edge," Miss Leonard is much more convincing as a girl reporter than her supporters were convincing as men reporters. Her main assistant in chasing down the grafters, particularly, had the smiting-hand-in-palm habit so bad that he either pounded the skin from it, or clenched and shook his fist every ten minutes to express every kind of emotion from joy to surprise, which is certainly evidence of an attempt to please a critical stage manager, but, let us hope, a failure in that regard as it was a failure of naturalness.

In every set of audiences of a day, for every picture, are sure to be some who know the ropes of any business portrayed. Fidelity to small details will make a hit in spite of large lapses, where good massed effects and untrue details will kill. The sooner every producer learns this, the better for the business. I don't look forward to the next Reliance play with the assurance that it will be truthful—I go in a critical mood. Why? Because they fell down hard, in portraying the genus newspaper man, in newspaper scenery, in the bygone in the newspaper way you suppose I was the only newspaper man to see this play? Why not, Mr. Stage Manager, take a little trip through newspaper offices before producing such a play, and get tips?

Now, the Reliance company is a good company; Miss Leonard is a popular actress, and they have the possibility always present of producing things which will hit the audience squarely between the eyes. But in certain instances, they fall down, just on the little details—the small things which makes the whole unnatural, as sour yeast will make the whole loaf bad. Vitagraph did the same thing with a good story, as mentioned first in this paper—and in the mind of the present critic—and believe me, producers, in the mind of the largely growing class of thinking beings who attend motion picture shows—there is little if any excuse for such lapses. We can, perhaps, the less readily forgive Vitagraph, because they so seldom fail. Perhaps we can the more readily forget it on that account. And High Heaven knows our memories are not long for picture plays—let Reliance come across with something as good all through as "In the Tepee's Light" or "The Railroad Builder" was in spots, and I will be the first to shout "bravo!"

"Well," you want to know, "what does this very captious critic regard as a wholly satisfactory and natural play, unmarred by unnatural acting or setting?" And doubtless you expect me to pick out some much heralded, much advertised and very well known film for an answer. But of those I have seen within a week, I would pick a little, modest, little-seen film called "A Mother's Anguish," by Eclair, as one of the best, most natural, most smooth, most perfectly acted, of any films I have seen for a long time. The story is very simple—a mother, wife of the keeper of a railroad crossing gate, thinks she sees her child run over. Child is actually not hurt at all. Mother loses reason. Doesn't recognize child. Finally, days later, reason restored by seeing child almost run over by automobile, a carefully arranged scene, designed by the doctor as an experiment to see if, as sudden shock took reason away, sudden shock will not bring it back. The experiment was a success. It is a medical fact that such things have been done.

Now here is a simple story which could have gone wrong very, very easily. But the child, running after her ball, does, seemingly, just barely get out of the way of the train in time, and the mother, on the other side, cannot see that the child is out of the way. The heart-rending grief of the woman is not poked down your throat—you see it in the distance as she runs wildly to the "accident" scene. The quieter but none the less intense grief of the stricken gate-keeper and the little daughter was beautifully done, and the mother's face and her actions when she recovers and strains her child to her heart are excellent. I couldn't pick a flaw—acting scenery, photography, plot, reasonableness, smooth action—all were excellent.

Not to throw too many flowers across the ocean, Biograph's "Crooked Road" convinced right straight through save for the last scene. The "Crooked Road" is a heart-wringer and the lady who plays the deserted wife is an actress, and my hat is off to her for her faithful and restrained portrayal of a woman facing poverty bravely, but without hope.

Only the last scene is open to criticism—it does not seem natural to me that a couple restored to one another after years of separation, where the one had so much to explain, the other so much to forgive, would show so little of any feeling save smiles and joy, in their final reconciliation. Up to the moment when she forgave her husband, he and she were fine. Then they both grinned like Cheshire cats. I don't like tears on the stage or in the play, but I refuse to be convinced that a deserted wife, in extremes of poverty, ill health, suddenly restored to her husband, who has reformed and who learns that he has reformed through love of her, and has been searching for her all these years, and that now she and her child are safe and protected—I refuse to believe that under such circumstances mere joy would not give place to some tears of relief, and I do contend that this insane desire for "happy endings" can be carried too far. The ending, in itself was happy enough, to be played naturally. It doesn't need to be thrown at the audience.

And—but there! I'm too long winded already. But I am glad to have this plea for more naturalness out of my system, and while I am pretty sure—being inherently a modest and shy individual—that what I say will have little effect, I am also pretty sure that what I have said here is what audiences generally are saying—and what they say and what they want, thank goodness, they are pretty sure, eventually, to get. So let us live in hopes!

"CHICAGO STOCKYARDS FIRE" (Imp).

Five hundred families were rendered homeless and millions of dollars in property were destroyed in the holocaust which swept the famous Chicago Stockyards last week—and by pure good luck an "Imp" camera man happened to be on the spot just as the big blaze started. "If I had been an hour later," he said, "I would have missed the best scenes." The Imp will release the stockyards fire picture on a split reel within a couple of weeks.

THE POWERS FOB.

The Nicholas Powers Company, 41[illegible] Nassau Street, New York City, manufacturers of the Powers cameragraph No. 6, are giving away as souvenirs a very neat and attractive watch fob to those of the trade who are interested in this form of ornament, and will forward those name and address.

The fob, which is one of the best souvenirs we have seen, is an oval plate on which is stamped a miniature photo of a No. 6 head, inlaid in blue enamel, and hangs on a black leather strap adorned with a gold inlaid buckle.

If you have neither seen nor come into possession of one of these fobs, it is your own fault, and we would advise you to get after one right away, for according to Mr. Aragon the benevolent distributor, they are going fast, but he still has one left for you.

The wonder of the week in the motion picture world was the announcement that the auditorium of Madison Square Garden would be transformed into a moving picture place. The idea! Madison Square Garden a picture house! Note the coyness of the dignified thespian as he struts along the White Way and declares that before he will take an engagement on either the Loew or Fox circuits he will sell peanuts. Curb your dignity, old fellow, the motion picture has your number. There was a time when it was a joke to the professional, but the joke proved a good one. There are some very clever people (under assumed names, of course) doing turns between the pictures on some of the circuits and they are beginning to realize that it is worth while. With all due respect I would say "There is a reason."

Madison Square Garden becomes a picture house. The season started on Thursday of this week. There are seats for five thousand persons. During the day a specially constructed daylight screen will show the pictures and at night the ordinary sheet will be used. The show will be augmented by a ladies' orchestra of twenty-five pieces. It will be continuous from one to eleven p. m. At the hour of our going to press the manager, Capt. J. A. Dressel phoned us that there were over 4,000 people in the amphitheatre.

Before expressing my opinion on the new venture I wish to say that if it proves a success moving pictures will be shown four months in each year at the Garden and the property will be withdrawn from sale. It's up to the pictures to make good. Will they? Well, let us size up the situation.

* * *

The Garden has not been the scene of elaborate displays and shows at all times. I well remember when it was a comic opera house. "Pinafore," "The Pirates of Penzance," "The Chimes of Normandy" and other like musical favorites were produced there during one summer season with some success. The place was transformed into a palm garden, and aside from the stage and auditorium there were walks winding seductively about tempting resting-places where refreshing beverages were served. O, no, the present rising generation has no recollection of this; but take up the stage annals of twenty-five or thirty years ago and you will find records that the Garden was kept open by something besides foot races, horse shows, circuses, etc.

If properly managed, the Garden can be made a successful summer picture house. The pictures must be the best and they must be produced with perfection. If vaudeville is introduced it must also be of good class. At the start the people may not flock for admission, although I anticipate large attendances prompted by curiosity. When the people are curious the management must make its mark. At no time would I expect to see a walking match, horse show, military display, bicycle race or some like rush past the ticket takers, but I do count on the management deciding that the pictures count up at night.

Despite the efforts of many unduly zealous people the motion pictures are daily increasing in popularity and steadily advancing from one plane to another. It is a pity that there is not some method by which certain people who are persistently attempting to stigmatize them cannot be held to the mark. Certain churches in Brooklyn have been particularly active in attacking the picture shows and the pastor of one of the churches, who is said to have been one of a party of investigators is credited with this statement: "The moving picture 'cadet' is a growing evil. Many of the little girls who gain admission to these shows have their tickets paid for by these creatures. The number of missing girls is increasing to an alarming extent, and when the detective goes out to look for one where does he search first? In these very places."

Had the clergyman who made this statement been a party to a full and impartial investigation he would not sanction such a report. He says the moving picture "cadet" is a growing evil and many of the little girls who gain admission to these shows have their tickets paid for by these creatures. This is practically a wilful distortion of facts; it is not based upon existing evidence, nor possible reason. The cadet system is so vile that it is closely shadowed by all who have the minutest element of manhood and no class of people are more active in squelching it than the members of the police force. It is true that many children who come under the law which fixes the age which children must attain before they can enter a picture show without being accompanied by parent or guardian do get into the shows. Managers of the picture houses admit this and have been subjected to censure by the authorities time and again. Passing to the side of the house, which the aforesaid clergyman does not give: A man, or woman, on the way to a picture show is accosted by a child of a neighbor who asks that the party act as guardian in the purchase of a ticket to the show. It is the most natural thing in the world for the good natured adult to assent.

The child gains admission. Sometimes the supposed guardian takes in two or three children. When the adult retires the children are frequently left behind. An inspector visits the place and finds the unaccompanied patrons. The proprietor of the show is called to account. What can he say? He knows every child he admitted was accompanied by an adult, but finds he has been tricked. Personal investigation has shown this practice to be a general one, but at no time aside from one or two instances in Brooklyn has the 'cadet' figured. In Brownsville, a suburb of Brooklyn, two cases were found where employees of a moving picture house led young girls astray and the punishment dealt to the guilty parties was so severe that crime in that direction has been very effectively cut off.

Most of the self-appointed so-called committees who go about seeking vice are almost wholly unreliable. In the first place their judgment is too biased, their interpretation of morality too narrow, and they lack the ability to discriminate. The investigating committee of which the clergyman to whom I refer was a member, declared that some of the picture shows visited produced pictures that were immoral because they portrayed Western scenes in which games of cards were played. I think Commissioner of Accounts Raymond B. Fosdick very effectively disposed of such arguments in his recent report to the Mayor of New York on motion picture shows, when he said: "Many pictures exhibited today may be classified as silly. Others, in the course of unrolling a dramatic theme, depict the commission of some crime. It is against this latter class that criticism is frequently directed. Pictures of this sort are approved by the Board of Censorship on the theory that the motion picture is a form of dramatic art and, together with the theater, must be allowed a certain liberty in depicting moral problems."

He is a poor critic who cannot be fair, and he is unjust to the point of criminality when he deals in generalities and makes no exception in behalf of those who are not guilty of what he has in mind. Many consistent church people frequent moving picture shows and they are catered to by the managements, and it is the loss of this patronage which the shows lose when sweeping allegations are made against them by the leading spirits of the churches. Although convinced that the shows are perfectly proper, many of these patrons timidly withdraw their patronage rather than risk the criticism of their more sensitive church people. Many managers have complained of such losses through attacks on the motion picture shows as a whole when in fact their particular places were entirely above reproach.

Mayor Gaynor gave these so-called investigators a cue for effective work when he stated a few days ago: "I tell you there isn't an indecent moving picture show in the city, no matter what my Commissioner of Accounts may say. The moving picture show is the poor man's theater and the class of people who patronize them wouldn't stand for indecency. You can get that on Broadway, in the 'white light' district and the theaters there, but not in the moving picture shows."

So far as I can see the so-called investigators feel content with newspaper notoriety. They proclaim great discoveries, but fail to verify them. If you go to them for evidence they tell you it has been turned over to some crime squelching society and that is the last you hear of the matter. If such cases as they allege exist why do they falter in placing the evidence they claim to have secured before the authority that has the power to revoke the license of the house violating the law? Condemnation of picture houses, or any other place, where the laws are being violated is perfectly proper, but those who are responsible for the condemnation should not stultify themselves by only performing their duty in part. Any place of that sort should be dealt with as fully as the law requires and those having the means for bringing about this end should be required to make good their charges. I think one of the most important steps for the association of exhibitors to take is to get after some of these so-called investigators when they make their charges through the press and require them to come up with the evidence and substantiate it, or desist from tactics that work hardships upon the innocent.

The Deagan Bells.

For the benefit of Eastern exhibitors who are on the lookout for anything that is novel in the way of sound effects, there has been placed in the New York office of The Moving Picture World a set of the well-known Deagan Bells which have been extensively advertised and used in all parts of the country. We find that these bells are all that they are advertised to be, and are in every sense of the term strictly musical bells. By this is meant the bells are perfectly tuned and are musical when operated by anyone who knows anything about music.

The Deagan bells are the regulation buzzing bells, such as are used commonly for door bells in dwellings. The difference is that they are nicely nickel-plated and altogether bear evidence that they are of a superior quality of material. These bells are arranged in two octaves, chromatic, or, in other words, 25 bells tuned accurately, requiring very little work to install, and operated from a keyboard arranged in piano fashion. Wherever the Deagan bells are installed they are operated by the piano player or the drummer, according to circumstances. It can be said that they have a great power of working up a musical effect or climax. They are especially good, we should think, during intermissions and for the repeating chorus of illustrated songs, which the audience is supposed to sing, and therefore extra stress is permissible in that way.

Those of our readers who are located in New York or vicinity, or those who are visiting this city from other cities, are advised to pay a visit to this office to witness a demonstration of the bells. We think it would be well worth any one's while to investigate this ingenious musical novelty.

Already these bells are very popular throughout the West, there being scarcely a theater of any pretense that has not already installed them. As yet they are not fully introduced in the East and for that reason Mr. James Deagan has sent us this sample set of bells as an evidence of good faith, being quite certain of the merits of his article. All that Mr. Deagan asks is a visit to this office to witness the effect of the bells, after which he is quite sure that he will receive an order.

Mr. Deagan's ad. appears on page 1264 of this issue.

NESTOR WILL AGAIN RELEASE "WESTERNS."

The public seems to want "Westerns," and the exhibitors are constantly demanding them from exchanges and manufacturers alike. The Nestor Film Company, which at one time was supreme in the production of Western films, ceased releasing subjects of the "Wild and Woolly" and turned its attention to better and more presumptious efforts. How well it succeeded is now common history which caused the wise ones to sit up and take notice.

Exhibitors, however, have been loud and persistent in their requests for Nestor Westerns, and David Horsley has finally capitulated. It is well to remark that the distinctly high class work done at the Baltimore studio will continue, and that in the near future the trade will have two Nestors a week.

Twenty actors and as many horses, representing a part of the Nestor Western Stock Company, are now in the Middle West, their ultimate destination being one of the most available sections of the Far West, where they will annex a goodly number of real cowboys, genuine Indians and spirited broncos. "The Savage" will be released May 31, and "The Cowpuncher," will be released June 7, and they are expected to measure up to the appellative "Worth-while."

REX INVADES BROADWAY.

Jas. A. Bliss Kidnapped in Broad Daylight While Wm. A. Brady Wasn't Looking.

We often hear of film manufacturers' scoops and schemes, but Rex has just put a "beat" over not only its film competitors but has reached out into Broadway and stolen one of the juiciest peaches from Wm. A. Brady's theatrical peachtree. It pilfered a prize right from the big orchard.

Scene 5.

Scene 6.

Jas. A. Bliss, the Broadway Laugh Trust, Ltd., who has starred in "Baby Mine," "The Traveling Salesman," "The Bachelor's Honeymoon" and a number of others—mind you, no less a personage than he—is now with Rex. Business of wonder, amazement, open-eyed astonishment, etc., etc. Rex is surely becoming the Napoleon of the Film World as well as the Christopher Columbus in discovering the aforementioned star to its already strong company. It's a coup to cap to the climax of film generalship. Every week Rex's individual way of doing things is becoming more marked; it is different. To call Rex the master of the film industry is perhaps too broad a statement, but certain it is that it is one of the masters.

We anticipate seeing Jas. A. Bliss's work in Rex films with considerable expectations. We have seen him on the legitimate stage and we know what's in him, and with Rex's admirable construction and technique, we look forward to something new in film comics.

An Intimate Picture of Mexican Rural Life.

There is substantial merit in a recent release "The New Sister" of the Biograph Company. It has been posed out how markedly distinctive the motion picture art of the realistic drama which has come. This quality is a valuable asset. It helps break down the barriers of misunderstanding between nations. "The New Dress" shows the atmosphere of Mexican rural life in a peculiarly intimate and instructive way. You may see national customs, like the early hour of conducting home the bride and groom from the church, as well, but Mexican traits and habit of mind are made clear to those who are understand them by almost every motion of the actors in the picture. So far as one who has never been in Mexico can gauge from other Latin-American scenes and people, the representation of the heroine's father is a typical small farmer. The reviewer has seen just such characters in the West Indies, but this farmer doesn't seem more real than the picture's other characters. So it seems not so much a real as lived. Jose's giving away the new dress in drunken generosity is a true picture of a land where common politeness requires an insincere surrender of home and holds to the phrase without. "This house is yours, senor," is a Latin-American formula of courtesy. The woman of the tavern, who wears the pretty finery and accepts it from the drunken man, is faithfully pictured also. She shows by her gestures that she understands the quality of her action.

Besides this tends to national characteristics, the picture has almost possible freedom from improbabilities. It tells a strong, dramatic story with a great deal of skill, and has a sure foundation of psychological truth. Maria, at the time her young husband gives away the new dress, is in a critical condition. She is about to become a mother for the first time. Her heart was girlishly set on having the new dress and since she knew that it was bought it was a great disappointment to learn that her husband "had lost it." When she sees it on the tavern woman, the effect is not surprising. Much less has temporarily unbalanced women in the same situation. Even a country doctor in rural Mexico would understand her case. The weakening of her mind when the baby comes was to be expected, such an ending to the difficulty might almost have been promised if the woman had before been normal and there was no history of insanity in her family. Such pictures interpret life and are instructive.

Kalem Sends Stock Company to Ireland.

The great popularity of the Kalem picture of last year, "An Land from Old Ireland," being largely due to the fact that it was made in the Emerald Isle and introduced many scenes familiar to the Irish American theater-goer, the Kalem Company are this year sending abroad a complete stock company for a protracted stay. They sail on June 3 on the S. S. Baltic and will not return until the end of September. Arrangements have been made with the titled owner of one of the most beautiful estates on the shores of the Lakes of Killarney for the use of the castle and grounds in the pictures, and a temporary studio will be erected for the interior scenes. Among the most important productions that is on the list of scenarios already laid out are the well-known dramas "Colleen Bawn" and "Arrah-Na-Pogue." These will be enacted before the camera in the exact localities with which they are associated.

The company will be in charge of Mr. Sidney Olcott, managing director, who was at the head of the Kalem Stock Company in Florida during the winter. Among the prominent members are Arthur Donaldson, who starred as the original Prince in the "Prince of Pilsen," and who will take the part of Father Tom in "Colleen Bawn." Another notable recruit from the ranks of the legitimate is Frederic Santley, who played prominent parts in the Maude Adams Stock Company. It is only reasonable to suppose that with these extensive preparations and enormous expenditures to produce the best, that the Kalem trade mark will continue to increase in popularity. It shows commendable enterprise.

Beginning Monday, June 30th, the Kalem Company will issue three reels per week. On that day they will release a splendid scenic film of more than ordinary topical interest, "Forest Mexico After the Battle." With two photographers on the job and ideal climatic conditions, an excellent negative has been obtained and we are told that the pictures are not lacking in interest. Excellent near views are shown of the insurrectos running around armed to the teeth, of the houses and buildings damaged by shot and shell, etc. It is a picture of historical interest and should be appreciated by the American public.

Chicago Child Welfare Exhibit.

Moving pictures of the Child Welfare Exhibit were taken this week by the Essanay Mfg Co. The films are to be sent broadcast over the country for educational purposes. The Boy Scouts, people from the Hull House settlement and and elsewhere peopled the scenes for the cameras. The result, we have been told, was very satisfactory. The pictures — 2,000 feet—were taken for Mrs. Emma Blaine at a cost of $2,000 and will be donated by her to the cause of the children.

State and county officials, municipal judges, aldermen, and members of the press made a private, personal inspection of the exhibit Monday night. An unusual program was offered for the evening and some thirty thousand citizens managed to see the "Circus" presented by the South Park children in approved three-ring style, 'mid blaring bands and shouts of clowns and ringmasters. Little daughters of Erin in shamrock dresses, about 200 on the floor at the time, whirled lustily around in jig and fling, to the delight of every true Irish heart. There were flower dances, gymnastics, and, as a grand finale, a fantastical Yama-Yama dance of the big girls that would have been an attraction in any musical comedy.

As previously mentioned, the motion pictures were projected on a daylight curtain, and there seemed to be a strong feeling among the officials and public workers present in favor of the "daylight auditorium," which took expression in several slides in propaganda for the subject, and of which we reproduce here two as follows:

"Permit your children to attend well-lighted picture theaters only. This entertainment proves that dark theaters are unnecessary."

"Moving picture theaters instruct and entertain the young of both sexes. To guard against vicious and immoral conditions, motion pictures should be shown in well-lighted theaters."

The evening entertainment ended with an informal supper. The moving picture trade was represented by Mr. Day, of the Essanay Co., A. W. Wilde, of Sunlight Metallic Cloth Curtain Co., and C. P. Harleman, of The Moving Picture World.

EDISON ECONOMY TRANSFORMER MAKES GOOD.

Harry A. Mackie, dealer in motion picture supplies at 853 Broadway, New York, informs us that he has beat all records in his sales of the Edison Economy Transformer and has not received a single complaint from any purchaser. On the contrary, he has received some flattering testimonials which we would like to reproduce if space permitted. The Edison Economy Transformer is a compact coil that is guaranteed to save from 60 to 65 per cent. on alternating current. It occupies less space than any other and as the 110 volt only costs $30, and the 220 volt $55, it should soon pay for itself. Mr. Mackie also says that the success of his repair department has necessitated doubling his space and facilities, which speaks well for the work, as he has only been established a few months. This department is managed by Mr. Brautigam, a skilled mechanic, and all repairs are guaranteed. Mr. Wm. F. Smith, an expert electrician, formerly in the employ of the United States Navy, is now in charge of the sales department.

A NEW PERFORATOR.

The Nicholas Power Company has just completed a new film perforator which promises splendid results. The mechanism, while simple, is absolutely accurate. The machine punches two holes at a time. The film is locked in place while at rest, a feature which will eliminate grave faults present in perforators of the past. Movement is had from a double cam and handled intelligently and with ordinary care should produce perforations absolutely accurate in spacing.

NEW INDEPENDENT EXCHANGE IN THE WEST.

The Reliance Film Service Co., 122 West Third Street, Davenport, Iowa, is the name of a new and substantial concern that has been launched to supply independent service to the Middle West. The officers are G. Frellson, president; John F. Scherer, secretary; C. E. Brown, treasurer; H. K. Curtis, secretary. An up-to-date business system has been installed and competent and experienced help secured for all departments. Exhibitors in Iowa and surrounding territory will no doubt be glad to hear that what promises to be a large buying exchange has been established in their midst and encourage them with a liberal share of their patronage.

Jacksonville, Fla.

The Imperial Theater, the new motion picture house for Jacksonville, Fla., is nearing completion, and it is expected the doors will be thrown open to the public on the afternoon of Saturday, May 20th, at 3 o'clock. The arrangement, decorations and complete details of the house are the ideas of the vice-president and general manager, N. W. Remond, and were put into working plans by James R. Walsh, a local architect. George B. Leonard is president of the company.

The house is to be devoted to motion pictures, illustrated songs and other vocal selections. Only licensed films will be exhibited, and Edison machines will be operated. Two small dressing rooms have been installed and completely equipped for the convenience of the singers in cases of necessity.

To the left of the entrance is a ladies' retiring room with maids in attendance; this is a decided innovation in motion picture houses in this locality and the management deserves great credit for its enterprise, and, in this, no doubt followers will be in the field. The ventilation campaign has inaugurated itself here and Jacksonville wishes to be recorded now as one of the sources furnishing early evidence of the effects of the crusade. With this view in mind, Mr. Remond has had installed two fifty-two-inch exhaust fans and many ventilators in all parts of the house. The building is not situated on a corner, but it is so located to permit openings on three sides, and in this manner it is hoped to keep the ventilation perfect and satisfy the most ardent admirers of the fresh air boosters.

In addition to the special ventilators there are a number of windows and five exits. The extra ventilation idea was also carried into the picture booth for the operators and machines. The floor space of the booth is slightly over seventy square feet. At the floor line, in the booth, openings have been made through the wall to the outside of the building; the full floor size of the booth is continued above the operators and machines to the roof of the building, and here an opening of sixteen square feet affords an exceptional draft. All openings of the booth will be self-closing.

The general design of the theater suggests some of the Grecian temples of ancient times. The arched front of the structure has the appearance of the inside of a half dome resting on numerous columns. The dome is divided into eleven segments of wedge shape, containing hunoreds of mirrors each, and each mirror separated by a latticed stucco work of beaded design.

Hundreds of lights will be distributed on this surface and, with the reflecting power of the countless mirrors, the desired effect of radiation will be produced. The name Imperial Theater will appear in red, purple and green lights, of which there will be four hundred and eighty. The orchestra floor has a seating capacity of four hundred and twenty-five, and a spacious balcony extending well to the front will seat two hundred and seventy-five additional patrons. Owing to the rushing of the work and being several weeks behind in the opening, the interior decorations will only be done in a temporary manner, though in a good finish and of pleasing tints of buff, cream and gold. As time permits, the permanent decorations and fresco work will be completed. The house is built on leased ground and cost twenty-three thousand dollars.

Representative Colson introduced into the Florida legislature, now in session, a freak bill prohibiting motion pictures or any other theatrical or vaudeville entertainment on Sunday, and through the combined efforts of the managers of the Jacksonville playhouses, led by Mr. J. B. Delcher, manager of the Duval Theater, it was defeated after much discussion.

The Montgomery Amusement Co., operating the Grand in this city, also a motion picture house in Columbia, S. C., is building one of the finest picture houses in the south, in Atlanta, Ga., and expects to throw open its doors within thirty days. The picture business was at low ebb in this locality until this progressive company began its rapid and lasting improvements.

Rev. W. A. Hobson, pastor of the First Baptist Church, is operating a motion picture machine for the amusement of the members of his congregation and their friends. Only religious subjects are being shown.

The operators of the picture machines have joined the national union and before each set of reels is begun they flash their trade label on the boards. E. O. UEDEMANN.

In the Mississippi Valley.

"Owing to the great demand for real piano players in the moving picture theaters," says George Fitch, the humorist, "Pearia's third conservatory of music will begin operations."

The Majestic, at Streator, Ill., has gone back to vaudeville and pictures.

William Stephenson is building an airdome on North Main Street, Jerseyville, Ill.

The Kedzie Amusement Company, of Chicago, has increased its capital stock from $50,000 to $75,000.

L. W. Goodell purchased the interest of his partner, M. H. Harris, in the Gem Theater at Beardstown, Ill., and has assumed entire charge of the picture show house.

The Parkway Amusement Company, of Indianapolis, has been incorporated to operate moving picture shows. The directors are P. J. Glenn, William Glenn and Frances Flaherty.

John E. Wager and Miss Gertrude Metcalf have bought out the interest of Miss May O. Hill in the Majestic Theater at Watseka, Ill. Miss Metcalf is experienced in the moving picture business, having been associated with her father for the past four years.

Manager Jack Root, of the Garrek Theater, Burlington, Iowa, was in Quincy, Ill., and arranged with Manager Wiley McConnell, of the Bijou Theater, to unite with him, and with Manager Charles Dodge, of Keokuk's vaudeville house, for the purpose of organizing a moving picture circuit for the summer season. It is the intention of these managers to put on moving pictures through the summer months, and the combination insures the latest and best films on the market. No film out more than two weeks will be used.

If you are looking for something that will typify the attitude and grounds for antagonizing the picture show you can't beat this from the Metz, Mo., Times. "Gabe Hadden ventured down from Bates County Saturday and put in the afternoon 'jawing' any one he came across. It is said that he heard Maltz had a picture show."

Milwaukee will have no censorship of moving picture shows. The licensing ordinance with this clause was voted down and one of two substitute measures is likely to be adopted. The new measure provides for the lighting of photoplay houses as fully as possible and places the regulation of this lighting in the hands of the building inspector. Theater owners are given six months in which to comply with the recommendation, and if they fail to make the desired changes, are subject to a penalty ranging from $1 to $100. Along with the substitute ordinances, the council committee was presented with a copy of the joint agreement between the theater owners and the legislative committee of the Central Council of Philanthropies. The theater owners agree to install lighted auditoriums as soon as possible; to station mature married men at their doors, thus lessening the danger of "mashing," and to join hands in barring pictures of crime and vice.

Alex Weil of Milwaukee, Wis., has secured a permit for $18,000 worth of improvement to a building at Eleventh and Winnebago Streets, that city, to fit it for a moving picture house.

Over fifteen hundred children, as the guests of the Minneapolis Journal, saw Lyman H. Howe moving pictures at the Shubert Theater in Minneapolis.

The remodeled Princess Theater, which will be devoted exclusively to pictures, has been thrown open at Milwaukee. Among the features are boxes on the sides so that ladies need not remove their hats, daylight pictures and a $2,000 pipe organ. The place will accommodate 1,200 persons.

A special election is to decide the fate of the Sunday moving picture. This shows the importance the photoplay has assumed in Fort Worth, Tex., where the City Council passed a resolution calling for a referendum election on Tuesday, May 28. The vote was taken after a petition from the photoplay managers of the city had asked permission to operate after 2 o'clock Sunday afternoons without music at the front doors. The call for the election is as follows:

Whereas, A controversy has arisen among the citizens of Fort Worth over the question of permitting moving picture shows to open on Sundays, and

Whereas, the city commission has been besieged by bodies of citizens on each side of this question; and

Whereas, the fundamental principle of commission government is obedience to the wishes of the citizens en masse, and that the commission itself is responsible directly to the people themselves under the provisions of the city charter; and

Whereas [illegible] whether the commission might take cognizance of the question it would still be hampered for adequate consideration of repeal of any ordinance attempting to regulate said question; and

Whereas, The commission is desirous of doing that which a majority of the citizens of Fort Worth may decide upon; The question of whether or not moving picture shows shall be operated on Sundays in the City of Fort Worth, has been referred to a referendum election to be held in that city on the 18th day of May, 1911, in accordance with the provisions of the new charter pertaining to referendum elections.

J. J. POWELL, Commissioner.

With a heavy heart and [illegible] Ohio, lowered opening picture shows on Sunday by approximately fifty majority.

M. Tuttle of Marysville, Texas, has made applications to open two of the moving picture shows in that city, one on Madison Avenue and the other on Hayward Boulevard.

Los Angeles.

By Richard V. Spencer.

Ten Producers now at work in California.—The month of May sees ten producing film companies at work in Southern California, among them the stars and headliners for the moving pictures assembled in the industry. The companies now at work at Los Angeles and vicinity are: The Biograph Company, Los Angeles; Selig, Los Angeles; Pathe, Los Angeles; Bison, Los Angeles; Cooperative, Los Angeles; Kalem, Glendale; Essanay, Santa Monica; American, Lakeside; Melies, Sulphur Mountain Springs, California, Long Beach. At least three more Independent producing companies are about to enter into the prolific field in California. One of the three have established offices in a northern city. The company whose name is withheld for the present, is said to have almost unlimited capital behind it, and associated with the company are men of prominence in moving picture manufacturing circles. The other two companies are not quite as well equipped, and little is known of the men who projected the companies. Los Angeles will soon lose several of the companies temporarily. The Biograph Company leaves for the Eastern studio of the company on May 21st and will not return to Los Angeles until the first of the year.

The Selig Company has divided its local stock company, and on the 21st Mr. Bosworth and about a dozen members of the company go North to spend the summer in Yosemite Valley. The other half of the company will remain here under the management of Francis Boggs, the general manager and chief director. It is said that the New York Motion Picture Company are about to establish another stock company in Los Angeles. The new stock organization will devote themselves to the production of straight drama, similar to the productions of the Reliance films. Mr. Fred J. Balshofer, general manager and chief dramatic director of the Western studio of the company, is now in New York organizing the new stock company. During his absence the Hines Studio is under the management of Mr. Frank Montgomery.

Several members of the Essanay Company have been in the city for the past few days. The Melies Company have just arrived in Southern California from San Antonio, Tex. They have established the Melies Studio in Ventura County, near the city of Santa Barbara,, so that forthcoming Star releases shall include the genuine California Western scenery, so much in demand in the film world. The Kalem, Bison, Pathe, American, California, Melies and Cooperative companies will remain in their respective localities for the summer, making side trips of brief duration for certain kinds of exotic settings not available near the studios. The California Company of Long Beach will soon be ready to enter the market. The Co-operative Film Manufacturing Company, a local corporation, are now engaged in making their pre-release reels. It is their intention to manufacture twenty reels before entering the market, arrangements for which are now progressing satisfactorily. The coming winter season will see moving picture cameras almost as plentiful as kodaks. Other Eastern companies are said to be making arrangements to establish California studios.

Mr. George K. Spoor, president and general manager of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, has been a city visitor for the past few weeks where he has been looking after Essanay interests. While here Mr. Spoor is a guest at the Alexandria Hotel.

Another Biograph Masterpiece Coming.—The last week of the Biograph Company's season in the southland sees them at work on what is destined to be recognized as a Western masterpiece and one of the most remarkable films ever taken. For the past four months the Biograph Company have been completing and gathering data for this forthcoming film. Mr. Griffith, chief dramatic director of the Biograph Company, for weeks has been searching for proper scene locations in which to film the story. He finally selected Topango Wash, a rugged canyon in the heart of the Malibu Mountains, some twenty-five miles from Los Angeles.

In order that exhibitors and the public may have some conception of the vast amount of detail to be arranged, it may be stated that 250 men, women and children, many of them actors and actresses of note, will take part in making this film. The film will be entitled "Crossing the American Prairies in the Early Fifties." Two hundred cowboys, and a hundred horses, have been secured from nearby ranches. Added to these are eleven prairie schooners of the type that rolled across the Western plains in the days of the early West.

Down on the banks of the Topango River an immense camp has been established. Seen from a distance the camp somewhat resembles a circus with two big tents, holding perhaps 500 people, and a score of other tents. Here for a week will be the headquarters of the organization.

The film will tell the usual type of the Western prairie story, but will tell it in the "Biograph" way, with all that the name implies in dramatic direction and acting. The story of the film deals with the rush for the West in the early fifties, just after the big California gold discoveries. The emigrants are moving through the Indian country when they are attacked by Indians. The train forms in a corral, with the wagons in a circle, and the emigrants prepare to pass the night in sleep. Guards have been posted and they relieve each hours. The tired guards fall asleep and the waiting Indians rush the sleeping camp. The emigrants awaken, seize their arms, and desperate battle ensues. The Indians win, taking the survivors captives. Then begins a heart-breaking march, during which the emigrant captives are dragged by their Indian guards to compel haste. The Indians hold a council and determine to burn the men at the stake, and to adopt the women and children into the tribe. The men are bound to torture stakes and fires are lighted at their feet. While the flames leap high between the captives and camera, the camera is stopped, and dummies are substituted at the stakes, and new fuel added to the flames. The women and children captives are eventually rescued by frontiersmen, and virtue triumphs in the end, the survivors later reaching California.

During the present stay in Southern California, the Biograph camera has recorded some of the most beautiful scenery to be found in the West. The scenic settings chosen for this and other companies working here have been praised around the world. The Biograph Company leave for their Eastern studio on May 21st. All Westerners wish them a pleasant journey, and will welcome them back with open arms when they return.

Miss Virginia Chester.—Formerly playing ingenué leads in Pathe Western Stock, and who has been ill for the past month, has left the Pathe Company. She is at liberty at this writinng.

Curiosity Seekers Annoy Local Producers.—Curiosity seekers anxious to see the moving picture camera "wheels go around" are daily journeying out to Edendale, the local Eden of the moving picture man, in order to see the different companies at work on interior scenes being staged at the studios. Every day witnesses from ten to twenty-five callers who offer various kinds of excuses for wanting to watch the stock companies at work. The Selig, Bison, Biograph and Pathe studios are surrounded by high walls. Professional visitors, exhibitors, newspapermen, and others directly connected with the moving picture industry are the only ones admitted to the studio grounds, the companies having been forced to make these rules in order to prevent interference with their work. Local stock actors in the legitimate are frequent visitors to the studios, and an occasional manager of a road attraction pays the studios a visit.

Essanay.—The Essanay Western Company, under the management and dramatic direction of Mr. G. M. Anderson, have established their studio in Santa Monica Canyon, some fifteen miles from Los Angeles. For the past four or five months they have been at work near the city of Redlands. There are now three companies working in what is known as the Malibu country, these being Biograph, Essanay and Bison, the latter of which is there on a temporary visit only.

Mr. James L. Magee, business manager for the Selig Western studio, has gone North with the Selig second company, under Mr. Bosworth, director. He will leave the company at Merced and will return to Los Angeles in a few days. The company will continue on into the Yosemite Valley, where they plan to spend the summer.

Selig.—The local Selig studio has installed a complete telephone switchboard connecting all departments with the central office of the studio.

Los Angeles Exhibitors.

Films Boost Beaches.—With forty of the most skilled and able boosters sojourning in the Southland, a carload of oranges, and several miles of moving picture film showing life at the local beaches, two special cars, a brass band and other necessities, left Los Angeles on a boost campaign through Arizona, New Mexico, Texas, and central California, where they will show the natives of those hot regions the advantages of spending a summer in comfort by the cool Pacific.

The boosters will advance in two divisions, the first going north through California. This aggregation will be accompanied by a brass band, projection machines, operators, and a portion of the films. The second division goes to the south through Arizona, New Mexico, and Texas. E. C. Thomas, who has been arranging for the various stops to be made by the first expedition upon its return from Texas, reports that the people of the various inland cities en route are anxiously awaiting the arrival of the boosters and promise them a big attendance and an enthusiastic reception. He has been assured by the Mayor of El Paso, Texas, that at least fifteen thousand people will welcome them to El Paso.

The South Coast beaches have spent $15,000 in preparing the lecturers with film, advertising matter, transportation, etc. The films are of the kind calculated to attract the attention of the dwellers of the hot inland cities. The films will show surf, bathing beaches, bathing and fishing scenes, glass-bottom boats of Catalina, the Strand at Santa Barbara, orange groves, snow capped peaks of Southern California, scenic railways, roller coasters, and other beach amusements. The lecturers will offer with the films facts and figures to show that most of the people can afford to take a vacation, and that California is the best spot to spend it.

The southern company, after leaving El Paso, will make a wide swing around the circle, and will visit Phœnix, Prescott, Douglas, Tucson, and other inland cities, where stops of a day each will be made. Stops during the afternoons only will be made in some small cities, and in the evenings at others. Both squads will go in special cars, attached to regular trains. Each squad plans to be gone two weeks and expects to be the means of bringing to the southern beach resorts several hundred thousand beach visitors from the cities visited.

Petite.—Broadway, between 5th and 6th Streets, is having the front of the theater remodeled. The theater has been dark for the past few days in order to let the men holding the alteration contract have full sway, that the work may be completed at as early a date as possible. The alteration consists of paneling the foyer, adding new lights, laying a new floor, and decorating the interior. The house will reopen in a few days. They have been using old run Licensed pictures, which they show for a five-cent admission.

"The Fall of Troy," the big Itala film, is said to be making a hit with the out-of-town exhibitors, who are falling over themselves in their haste to book it. This film has played to exceptionally good business at the beaches.

Star Theater Dark.—The Star Theater, East 5th, near Main, has been dark for the past two weeks. The house before it closed used Licensed service. A prominent local physician is contemplating leasing the theater, and if the lease is secured, promises to put in necessary alterations and make a specialty of showing scientific, scenic and educational films.

New Airdome at Riverside.—A new airdome has opened at Riverside, Cal. The new house is under the management of Wiel & Barth, who have signed up with a local Independent exchange for Independent film service.

Exchange Employee Injured.—Charles Chamberlain, shipping clerk for Miles Brothers local Independent exchange, was recently the victim of a peculiar accident. Two automobiles were coming down a down town street, one automobile in tow of the other. The rope connecting them became slack and dragged on the street. Young Chamberlain started to cross the street, failing to notice the slack rope. Just as he arrived over the rope, the front automobile started pulling the rope taut, and throwing Chamberlain into the air. He fell heavily, suffering a compound fracture of the right leg. He was immediately taken to the Good Samaritan Hospital, where he is doing well, considering the seriousness of the injury.

More Censorship.—A peculiar situation has arisen in connection with the regulation of moving picture shows. The ordinance hedges them about with stringent fire restrictions, of which they do not make special complaint, but petitioned show that certain other shows, calling themselves "airdomes," have been able to dodge the restrictions. The proposed forthcoming ordinance relative to the regulation of the city's picture shows will be amended to include the airdomes.

New Theater for Long Beach.—Long Beach is about to have another up-to-date theater in the heart of the business district. Dr. Earnest A. Hall, who arrived in the city recently, accompanied by his architect, Robert B. Ogden, of Riverside, has purchased the lot opposite the Salt Lake Depot and is now engaged in preparing plans for a modern theater.

Automobile Advertising Film.—About one thousand automobile dealers of Los Angeles and Southern California gathered at the Gamut Club Theater recently as guests of the Studebaker Brothers Company, of California, and after enjoying a sumptuous luncheon retired to the auditorium of the club, where they were treated to a moving picture show which has never been equalled in this part of the country. A descriptive lecture was given with the pictures by F. H. Smith. The pictures yesterday showed the various operations incident to the manufacture of the "E-M-F" motor cars. More than six thousand feet of film is used in depicting the various branches of the automobile industry. Practically every important detail entering into the construction and testing of the automobiles are shown in the thousand feet of film, which took more than two hours to run off. A company of E-M-F officials, headed by Mr. Smith, have been traveling all over the United States showing the films and accompanying them with lectures. Recently the pictures were the first ever shown on a moving railroad train, this novelty occurring on their trip down from San Francisco on "The Lark," the crack Pullman train of the West. Current was secured from the train dynamo, and the passengers of the train were treated to the rare spectacle of being entertained by a picture show on wheels. The travelers to see the pictures applauded the novelty and expressed themselves as being very grateful for the free entertainment. The films show the operation of casting the cylinders, drop forging operations, tests of strength of parts, operation of various wonderful automatic machines in the factory, and finally the assembling of parts and testing of cars, and the road test.

Washington, D. C.

The Flea Circus, which gained a popularity at the Metropolitan picture theater, just had a week's engagement at the Lyceum, one of the large theaters here. It took the form of a vaudeville act, with Prof. R. A. Nokes making explanatory remarks, as the reel unfolded. It was pronounced highly enjoyable and interesting.

A new picture house is under construction for W. H. Bradley, which will be opened in the fall, showing Independent films. This is said to be commodious and up-to-date in every way. Mr. Bradley has been connected with the motion picture business for some years, and his new venture has every reason to be a success.

One of the most successful runs of a reel is being experienced at the Virginia with Napoleonic reel, Grenadier Roland. Manager Chick secured this film for four days and every day meant a big house. Music necessary to make this a success was not omitted.

The Washington Film Exchange has gone into larger and more commodious offices and the name Paramount has passed into oblivion. Joe Marentette is always pleasantly on hand when Manager Lucus is on the road, which happens to be most of the time. A little later things in the new quarters will be in better shape.

The Alhambra, under the management of Wm. Avery is finding excellent success with the daylight screen having followed closely the ideas of Mr. Richardson of The World. Mr. Avery is something of a mechanic himself and has introduced many "little inventions of his own" that have assisted in the clearness of the picture, the absence of flickering, depth, etc. He will shortly introduce another improvement of his own. With the ventilation plant now installed, the Alhambra is cool and refreshing.

From May 17 to May 20, The Empress showed Grenadier Roland with the same careful presentation that characterizes this theater. There was always a large crowd and the music was in keeping with the progress of the reel. From a historical and dramatic viewpoint, the Burning of Moscow, in which the great Napoleon met such deep losses, may be classed as one of the finest of the film industry.

Tom Moore, manager of the General Film Exchange, has returned from New York, where he tendered his resignation in that capacity. Mr. Colpin is installed at the head of affairs here and Mr. Moore will become an exhibitor. This has been a long contemplated movement on Mr. Moore's part for some time.

New England

Discriminating against Uncle Sam—Governor Eugene Foss of Massachusetts, on May 18, signed the bill prohibiting the barring of persons wearing the uniform of our Army or Navy from theaters and all other places of amusement. A communication from the Secretary of the Navy called Governor Foss's attention to the fact that, in some places, men in uniform had been discriminated against, and conferred with the Governor relative to this Massachusetts legislation on the matter. There has been considerable agitation regarding this affair of late, as has been noted in these columns. The latest disturbance comes from New Hampshire, it is stated that the Premier Screen Temple and the Empress Theater, both devoted to photoplay exhibitions, have been refusing admittance to the boys in uniform. These two theaters also run dancing pavilions in connection with their moving picture shows, but on separate floors. When the management of the Premier Screen Temple refused to allow several blue jackets to enter their floor, the matter was brought to the attention of the Mayor of Lynn. Why such an absurd and unfair attitude should be held by these houses is difficult to understand. A supreme disregard for the United States Army and Navy, and a similar disregard for the box-office receipts seems to be rampant in Portsmouth. Apropos of this matter, the World's New England representative has in mind something of a similar nature which occurred to a moving picture house last year and which may be of interest at this juncture. A certain moving picture theater held as a portion of its audience a handful of United States sailors in uniform. Among them two were under the influence of liquor and were disturbing the whole house by their behavior, taking the form of petty nuisances, interruptions, etc. These two men were ejected by the management. This action came to the attention of the Navy Yard, Charlestown, Mass. A letter from the Navy Yard, inquiring as to the truth of the assertion, and asking why the men had been forced to leave the theater, if it were true, had been made to leave was the next step in the matter. Upon receiving a reply from the theater stating that the reason of the ejection was the intensity of the two sailors, and when this statement had been verified by the sailors, who had been with the two men at the theater, the Navy Yard again wrote the house stating that they were glad to learn that the uniform of Uncle Sam had not been discriminated against, and were pained to hear of the condition of the men and apologized for them. It is because of this incident, all of which is perfectly well known to the writer, that he condemns the attitude of the Portsmouth houses. If the sailors or soliders commit no nuisance, there can be no reason for discrimination against them just because of their uniform, which, by the way, is most honorable and worthy. By the case just related it can be readily seen that the Navy does not "stand back" of their men when they outrage their uniform. It is to be hoped that such defiant and absurd discrimination against United States soldiers and sailors will cease wherever it may have been in vogue—it is unworthy of mutography.

The Westminster Theater, Providence, R. I., has closed its regular entertainment season, and opened a supplementary summer season devoted to "pop" vaudeville and pictures on May 15th. The house no doubt will play to good business being large and cool.

The Palace Theater, Fall River, Mass., will play stock company attractions over the summer season, but will return to Licensed reels and vaudeville this fall according to Manager George Graham.

Special Note.—Messrs. McCue and Cahill, sometime on the vaudeville stage, but for some years proprietors of extensive moving picture interests in Lowell, Brockton, Haverhill and other New England cities, are about to return to their old sailing, but only for one night. These two men, now owning so many picture and vaudeville houses, are shortly to journey to Rockland, Mass., where they will do their old "turn," and go through all their former stunts for the Knights of Columbus, who are holding a performance there. Messrs. McCue and Cahill stated that they feel rather shaky, but hope to acquit themselves with credit.

Messrs. McAloon and Donovan, proprietors and managers of the Casino Theater, Taunton, Mass., will shortly open a theater in Sandwich, Mass. This house is the only theater on Cape Cod which boasts of a regular theater license. The house seats nearly 1,500 people, and will be devoted to Licensed pictures and vaudeville. As Messrs. McAloon and Donovan have made big successes of their houses in Taunton, New Bedford, Whittenton and Southbridge, Mass., it can be forecasted that this house will also be a winner. The two men are hustlers and know the business expertly.

The Casino Theater, Providence, R. I., is to be managed by Frank L. Browne, of Boston. Mr. Browne formerly managed the Eastlime, Beacon, Old South and Washington Theaters, Boston, and has had considerable experience in this line.

The Bijou Amusement Company, operating the Bijou Theaters in Fitchburg and Springfield, Mass., have made arrangements by which they will acqure the management of the Cummings Theater of Fitchburg, Mass., extending over a period of one year.

Boston

Going Some.—The Globe Theater, Washington Street, playing "pop" vaudeville and pictures over the summer season, has advertised the fact in our local papers that 36,000 was the number of patrons viewing their "big show" on the opening week.

Managers Convene.—On May 16 a large meeting of managers of theaters situated throughout New England took place at 43 Mason Street, Boston. A large majority of those present were moving picture managers, who use vaudeville to fill out their programs. This meeting was held to perfect the organization, which is primarily to protect the theaters within its fold from anything that may arise. It seems that the theaters have at different times been placed at a disadvantage, owing to trouble arising between them and their talent. As many of the vaudeville actors belong to a protective association, it was felt that the managers should also organize; in order that they should not be placed under difficulty by any concerted action on the part of the actors, such as a concerted "strike" on the part of the vaudeville actors on the bill of a theater. The organization also aims to protect the amusement houses against unjust or freak legislation which may come before the Legislature. Among those present at the meeting were: R. G. Larsen, representing Keith's Theater; Charles F. Smith, of the Unique Theater, Boston; G. Barrett, of the Orpheum, Dover, N. H.; H. Abrahams, of the Portland Theater; Portland, Me.; J. Louire, of the Beacon Theater, Boston; and Colonial Theater, Lawrence, Mass.; G. L. Appleby, of the Star Theater, Boston; N. J. Laydon, of the Imperial Theater, Boston; Nat Burgess, of the Old South; and Washington Theaters, Boston; H. E. Jones, of Potter Hall Theater, Boston; W. E. Greene, of the W. E. Greene Film Exchange, Boston; and many others. The picture interests are very active in the association and it is hoped that the association will tend to raise the quality of the acts used in the New England houses. It is stated that there will be very few moving picture houses throughout New England, using vaudeville, that will not affiliate themselves with the organization. Dues will be levied on the houses to pay for the running expenses. This meeting, embracing moving picture managers throughout New England, shows how easy it becomes to bring the picture men to organize, provided the right incentive is not lacking. Apropos, of the vigorous campaign now waged in the Moving Picture World for the organization of the picture men throughout the country, it has now been shown the New England picture interests are not backward in getting together. The World is the initial impetus, and an organization can be easily effected hereabouts.

Pictures Prevent Truancy.—Moving pictures in the schools of Boston to prevent truancy were recommended by Mary Boyle O'Reilly, of the Boston Children's Institutions Commission before the Submasters' Club at the Hotel Vendome, on May 18. She stated, with great good sense, that geography, history and many other subjects could be most interestingly and impressively taught by moving pictures; for the reason that a child best remembers what it sees. Such a plea as this by Mary Boyle O'Reilly cannot help but have a most pleasing and helpful influence on moving pictures in this city. In view of the deplorable fact that moving pictures were recently barred from all local schools, due to the very narrow minded ideas of one of the School Committee, the sentiments just related are particularly pertinent. It is hoped that Miss O'Reilly's opinions on the matter will overbalance those of the single member of the School Committee, and that the manufacturers of moving picture machines will soon be explaining the virtues of their wares to the city of Boston.

Gaiety Theater.—On Monday, May 22, the Gaiety Theater, Washington Street, closed its regular season of burlesque attractions, and opened a summer season devoted to Licensed pictures and vaudeville. This house is a large, cool theater and one of the newest in this city. The Gaiety is situated just opposite the Globe Theater, the only other regular theater now devoting itself to "popular amusement."

The Gaiety tried the "pop" vaudeville and picture game last summer and did not make good. The reason is simple, and the manager of the house himself agreed with the World's New England representative as to the cause. The Gaiety introduced too much and too expensive vaudeville and charged twenty-five cents for its seats. The Globe, just across the way, charging only 10 cents, and offering a pleasing show of pictures and less costly vaudeville, caught the crowds. This year the Gaiety will profit by its lesson. The two houses will make a hard fight for trade, and the chances are will about split the trade this year. Between these two large houses it will be rough sledding for several nearly straight picture houses.

W. E. Greene Film Exchange.—The W. E. Greene Film Exchange has contracted to supply a large number of parks, airdomes, etc., with Independent service during the hot months. This exchange is unusually busy, and offers the "cream of the Sales Co.'s output."

Oriental Theater.—The Oriental Theater, Washington Street, has closed for the summer season. The house will reopen in the early fall with moving pictures and songs.

The Still Alarm.—The World's New England representative has been spoken to by so many moving picture managers regarding Selig's "Still Alarm," that the fact should be noted.

Two managers stated that patrons have told them that the picture was one of the best ever seen; and that the fire scene, in particular, nearly "knocked them off their seats," so realistic and grimly terrible was it. [Our own critics are also enthusiastic.—Ed.]

Operators' Union Revel.—The Moving Picture Operators' Union, of Boston, held its "big time" when a vaudeville and picture show was presented at the Columbia Theater, Sunday, May 21. The show was a huge success from every viewpoint. The general treasury was swelled in good fashion by the receipts. This union is growing, and is one of the best conducted and cared for in the country. Its list of members in good standing is increasing day by day, and has nearly 500 on its roll call at this writing.

HENRY.

Cleveland.

Keith's Hippodrome has closed the vaudeville season and is now showing pictures twice daily, at 10 and 20 cents, to fair business. Six reels, three of which are scenic, with music by a capable pianist, make up the program, changed Sunday and Thursday. Essanay's "Sensational Logging" was a feature of the inaugural shows.

Lyman H. Howe is filling a five weeks' season at the Colonial to excellent business. His staff photographer recently took a number of local scenes, and their production, which he announces for the last week, are awaited with interest. Mr. Howe evidently has pried open the market for his patrons' benefit, as his programs include both Licensed and Independent regular releases. He exhibited the Pathe "Over Lucerne in an Airship" the day before its release, and Itala's "Foolishead in the Lion's Den" was included in the same program.

Mr. Lowden, of the Victor Film Service, has assumed the management of the Isis Theater, Superior Avenue, near E. 89th Street. The Isis opened New Year's Day, and has had a rather varied career, just recently having discontinued stock and vaudeville in favor of pictures. With a capacity of about 600 and a most striking and tasteful front, it will undoubtedly be a big success under Mr. Lowden's management, in spite of the strenuous competition in that locality.

The Mall, on Superior Avenue, near the Square, featured the old Selig "Briton and Boer," preceded by a few slides of the Boer War, with a lecture, and found it a profitable experiment at an increased admission.

The summer weather has begun its annual inroads upon the check books of local managers, some reporting about a third decrease.

Puddlehead's tour of Panama, illustrating the work on the Isthmian Canal by slides and motion pictures, was a good drawing card at the Alhambra the week of May 15. Incidentally, Edison's recent film, "The Panama Canal in 1911," showing many of the same scenes, had been shown there a short time previous.

Marlo Hall is undergoing extensive alterations, and promises when completed to be an exceptionally attractive photoplay theater.

The Lorain Theater has discontinued vaudeville for the summer season, and the admission will be reduced to five cents. It being one of the Lake Shore Film Co.'s houses, Independent pictures are shown, with music by a capable pianist.

The Penn Square Theater and the Doan, situated respectively at E. 55th Street and Euclid, and E. 105th Street and St. Clair, will soon be completed, adding two more fine houses to Cleveland's already extensive list.

B. G. DRUMMOND

Seattle, Wash.

Eugene Levy, owner of the Circuit, Exhibit and Ideal theaters, of this city, is anticipating opening the Grand Opera House, June 1, 1911. The Grand Opera House seats about 2,000 people and will be the largest motion picture theater in the Northwest. The policy of the theater is to run light vaudeville, together with first run Licensed films, at an admission of ten cents. The operating room, which is nearing completion, is finely equipped and fireproof. Two Powers No. 6 Camerographs will be used, together with dissolver and spot light. Mr. Levy will install a ten-piece orchestra to accompany the pictures. This will be the first time anything of this sort has been ventured in the Northwest, so we all look forward to Mr. Levy's success.

F. W. Jewell has purchased the Diadem Theater, which will be known hereafter as the Jewell Theater. Mr. Jewell is figuring on remodeling the theater throughout. The policy, Mr. Jewell would not state, as he says he has something new for Seattle. The admission will be 10 cents.

Mr. Arthur Ewell has been appointed manager for the People's Amusement Co., and will manage the Lyceum, Odeon and Alaska theaters, of this city. Mr. Elwell is well known here, and is expected to be successful in his new position. Mr. T. Smith will remain as treasurer for the company.

The F. M. A. had their Fourth Annual Benefit at the Seattle Theater, Friday, May 19, 1911.

The Pacific Northwest Convention of the I. A. T. S. E. was held at Vancouver, B. C., May 8, 9, and 10, 1911. Mr. A. T. Lambson, of the Class (A) Theater, represented the operators for Seattle.

The National Moving Picture Theater, on Pike Street, has installed a "Radium" daylight screen.

The Old Orpheum Theater, which Sullivan and Considine are transforming into a moving picture house, will be known as the Coliseum Theater. The policy of the house has not been given out as yet, but will appear in a forthcoming issue of The World.

At an initial expenditure of $10,000, the Great Northern Railway has begun obtaining motion picture films of the Pacific Northwest in a plan to cover the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Howard A. Noble, of the Advertising Department of the Great Northern, with Ed. F. Sewell, a motion picture expert, arrived in Seattle today. Noble said that the Great Northern will obtain 10,000 feet of film. A special car will be fitted out with a plant for the manufacture of the films. The films will be sent to Northern Europe, together with lecturers who will exploit the whole Northwest country. Every point of manufacturing will be shown.

H. C. Rawlings, formerly manager of the Diadem Theater, of this city, is preparing to tour the country with a number of feature reels.

Motion pictures were the feature of the services of the Queen Anne Congregational Church last Sunday, May 14. The films, three in number, which illustrated "The Deluge" and the "Life of Moses," were shown. The Rev Sydney Strong lectured on the pictures as they appeared on the screen. The pictures were shown twice—the first time at four o'clock for the children and again at eight o'clock for the general public. Mr. E. W. Jones, formerly of the General Film Co., operated the machine with very good results, the projection being excellent.

Mr. P. Gevurtz, formerly manager for the People's Amusement Co., here, has departed for New York City. His address will be the Waldorf-Astoria.

It was stated in last week's World that motors would not be allowed to run picture machines by order of City Electrician Joslyn. The association of managers and operators reports progress. It is rumored that the city electrician will license operators, and if found competent they will be allowed to use a motor. Details will be given later.

The World's representative visited the Jewell Theater, which is being completely renovated. Mr. Jewell has purchased a mammoth pipe organ from Sherman Clay Co., of this city, and states that the house will be remodeled and redecorated throughout. The house seats about 500 people, and it is expected that with a good bill of Independent pictures at a five cent admission Mr. Jewell will be satisfied.

L. L. GOLDSMITH

Chicago Houses in Review.

The Virginia Theater, at Forty-third Street and Indiana Avenue, is a handsome little house, succeeding with pictures and songs after trying vaudeville for a long time. It is a fair type of the better class of moving picture theaters and its patronage reflect the character of the people of the neighborhood. As may be expected, the projection is faultless; the pictures on the screen is brilliant steady, and flickerless, and run at the proper speed. Manager Leroy Templeton is a Moving Picture machine more than two years old, and says that the original one and some are still in service. A pretty lamp is responsible for the durability of the Motiograph. Mr. Templeton has not had it necessary to use less than an ampere in arriving at one to his theater. Instead, he relies on perfect projection and careful selection of his subjects. One the current week must be twenty days or more old. Selections of this kind a thing which cannot always be had when using films of around a third run, and Mr. Templeton evidently knows that it is of more importance than the age of a film. The Virginia is equipped with a pipe organ, which accompanies with some pictures better than tin-panny tones of the two pianos used. Mr. Templeton has no preconceive against the foreign films, and likes the Urban Eclipse and Gaumont which I saw the evening I visited the place.

The Harmony Theater, near Vincennes Avenue on Forty-third, is another theater which changed to pictures after previous struggles with vaudeville. It is a well designed, pretty little theater and well patronized. The pictures are fairly well projected, but they suffered when I saw them by being run a bit too fast. The alternating of the arc and the lamp getting into synchronism with the exposures of the three-wing shutter and causing that unpleasant "flaring" of the light which has been spoken of so many times. The pianist played to the pictures pretty well here, accompanied in some of the pathetic scenes by violin. The floor has a very deep slope, enabling one to see the picture well from any seat, as the picture is raised considerably above the first row of seats. As a whole, the Harmony is a pleasant place to spend an hour.

The Star Theater, near Cottage Grove Avenue, is one of the few store theaters on Forty-third Street. The picture on the screen is fairly good, considering the fact that the throw is at a very bad angle sidewise. Unfortunately, a row of posts in line with the middle of the picture spoils many of the best seats in the house. Independent films are used.

The Washington Theater, on Cottage Grove Avenue, just south of Forty-third, is continuing its success as a picture house. It is a pleasant, inviting theater, and the films are carefully selected. Whichever it was that the house somewhat over a year now, and made it successful with only pictures. But I must say that the picture on the screen is not as good as it ought to be. The screen is entirely unprotected from the side and exit lights, and the brilliancy of the picture is seriously affected. The Vitagraph "Hungry Hearts" was shown here and looked like a piece of very bad photography indeed, on this light-struck screen. Vitagraph pictures have mostly a very heavy deposit of silver in the emulsion, and when this sort of picture is thrown on a light-shot screen it looks very poor indeed. That the people realize that there is something wrong with the picture at the Washington is attested by the fact that many of those in the middle of the house sought the front seats as soon as they were vacated in order to make out the picture more distinctly. This is something I have never seen before, as generally the patrons of a picture house want to get a fair distance from the curtain. If the side-lights of the Washington were properly shaded and a more powerful light obtained on the picture, the projection would be very much improved and brought up to the standard which might be expected of such a house.

The Victor Theater, near Ellis Avenue, is fortunate in possessing a mirror screen, which is a positive necessity on a long throw such as this theater has. The picture is very well projected and may be seen easily from the back row of seats unlike most places where the throw is so long. Manager Grung has installed side lights of correct design, unlike those he found in place when he took the house some six weeks ago, which were merely unshaded red bulbs, hard on the eye and yet not lighting the seats. This is the second house on Forty-third Street to use Independent service, the other being the Star.

The Ellis Theater, across the street from the Victor, is using Universal films, but one's enjoyment of them is seriously marred by the comments of the drummer down front, who "explains" the pictures by such remarks as (when a smear came into the room where a man was lying): "What! Nothing the matter with him? We'll make something the matter with him." This flippant attitude toward the pictures is totally wrong, and ruins the effect. Toward eight o'clock, when the crowd began to gather, the pictures were hurried so that they could hardly be made out for jump and vibration. The film I saw thus ground up was the excellent Biograph "The Spanish Gypsy," but it looks like poor junk at such a high rate of speed.

The Bon Ton Theater, at East Thirty-first Street and Indiana Avenue, has changed hands, the previous owner's lease expiring the first of May. George Nestle and Jack Kerwin, the new owners, have set to work and improved the projection to the high standard of the other houses on the street, and have changed the service to Licensed. This was wise, as there are three other houses on the street using Independent films, and programs were bound to clash. Mr. Kerwin is a good singer, and gives two songs at each show. With the clear pictures projected by the new lens and machine, the outlook for the Bon Ton Theater is better than it was before.

Indianapolis.

The city legal department has recently given an opinion relative to moving picture exhibitions that has attracted no little attention and which will bring about an amendment to the ordinance regulating the construction of buildings used for moving picture exhibitions. Until recently, T. A. Winterrowd, city building inspector, has refused to permit moving picture shows to be given in school and church buildings on the ground that such buildings were not erected for moving picture shows. The city legal department holds that the ordinance can only apply to buildings that have been erected expressly for moving picture exhibitions, and that therefore there is nothing to stop such shows in churches and school buildings.

On May 15 there were sixty-six moving picture theaters in the city and before June 1 there will be at least ten more. It is interesting to note that of this large number, only fifteen are located in what is known as the downtown business district. This is apparently due to the enormous rents that are demanded downtown. The Orpheum, which is located in Washington Street, near Pennsylvania St., is reported to be paying $12,000 a year rent. This theater charges ten cents admission. The number of places mentioned in the city does not include regular theaters, where moving picture shows and vaudeville are being given during the summer.

A ruling by building inspector Winterrowd is working considerable hardship on a number of moving picture theaters. This is to the effect that vaudeville must be construed as a theatrical exhibition and that therefore vaudeville can only be given in buildings constructed under the regular theater ordinance. This ordinance requires exits opening on two thoroughfares and provides for certain provisions of construction tending to safeguard the spectators. A majority of moving picture theaters are in store rooms on inside lots and cannot conform to the theater ordinance. The building inspector has decided he will permit only moving pictures and illustrated songs in moving picture theaters.

Permits have been issued for a large number of moving picture theaters and airdomes, which are under construction. The permits issued are as follows: Saffell Brothers, Sheldon St. and Roosevelt Ave., airdome, seating capacity 500; Fred Sanders, 1104-1106 Prospect St., airdome, seating capacity 500; Princess Amusement Co., 1107 S. Meridian St., airdome, seating capacity 500; W. E. Marlin, Yandes St., near 19th St., airdome, seating capacity 500; L. A. Glazier, Ohio and Blake Street, airdome, seating capacity 600; Wehmeyer and Gentry, Blake and North Streets, airdome, seating capacity 500; Peter Scheib, Brightwood Avenue and Twenty-fifth St., airdome, seating capacity 300; Louis Burkhardt, Wilkins and Meridian Streets, airdome, seating capacity 400.

J. B. Harrel has begun the erection of a moving picture and vaudeville theater at 1248 E. Washington Street, which will cost $15,000. It will be a one-story brick structure and will have a capacity of 500 persons. The new theater will be completed about August 1.

* * *

Beginning today, Photoplane pictures will be put on exclusively at B. F. Keith's for the summer, the vaudeville season having closed Saturday night. To make the pictures more attractive, palms, potted plants, vines, flowers and two fountains will surround the screen upon which the pictures will be produced.

CLARENCE L. CUMMINS.

Pauline Bush.

The New Leading Lady in the "Flying A" Western Company.

The Manufacturers of "Flying A Cowboy films," the American Company, of Chicago, announce a decided "find" in Miss Pauline Bush, a young lady now playing leads in their Western company. Miss Bush is an extremely versatile actress.

Pauline Bush

young, winsome, graceful, and an extremely good rider. Her theatrical experience has been comprehensive and during the last couple of years she has invariably been cast in leading roles in the theatrical companies she was connected with. Her name is a by-word in informed theatrical circles on the Coast, and the American Company announces that her ability as a moving picture actress is exceptional in one whose experience has been wholly before the footlights.

The first film that Miss Bush appears in, of the "Flying A" productions, is entitled "Rattlesnakes and Gunpowder," a comedy film that is said to be a winner, and which will be released Monday, May 29th.

On Thursday of the same week the exhibitors will have an opportunity of judging as to Miss Bush's worth in a strong dramatic part in film entitled, "The Sheepman's Daughter," released by the American Company Thursday, June 1st. Miss Bush plays the title role and we are informed that she, in that film, will more than make good to the picture fans.

Miss Bush is announced as an added feature to the "Flying A" productions, and it undoubtedly will be well worth the while of the exhibitors to feature the productions in which Miss Bush appears.

THE PERIL OF DIAZ.

Above is the title of the Champion Film Company's release of May 29th and it is a safe guess to predict an immense popularity and large business for this film in every locality. The eye of all the world has been on Mexico for the past few months and especially the watchful eye of the Government at Washington. This reel, showing as it does the mobilization of the U. S. troops on the Mexican border, is another signal demonstration of the enterprise of the Champion Film Company and Independent exchanges and exhibitors throughout the country will appreciate the opportunity of showing their patrons the readiness of our army for such emergencies.

The drilling of Infantry, Cavalry and Artillery in intricate formations and clever tactics, the Engineering Corps constructing pontoon bridges and the Signal Corps keeping up communications and even the "boys" at mess are all realistically portrayed in photographs of actual conditions as seen from day to day among the American troops now in Texas, ready for any emergency in the present chaotic condition in the Mexican Republic.

THE SARDINE INDUSTRY.

Lubin issues on June 4th an extremely interesting and instructive film showing how sardines reach your table from the time they are caught to the time they are shipped, packed in the cans. The film shows the fishermen mending their nets; their departure for the fishing grounds, casting the nets; hauling them in; transferring the fish from the boats to the packing houses; the various operations of canning; sealing the cans and finally loading them on cars for shipment to all parts of the world.

LOST!

JAMES A. BLISS

The Famous Broadway Star

Known throughout the amusement world as the "Somewhat Stout Comedian."

When last seen, Mr. Bliss was leaving Wm. A. Brady's Theatrical office on Broadway. Age 32, Height 5 ft. 8 in., Dark Hair and Eyes, wore a navy blue suit; for the past year has been starring in "Baby Mine". Reward for information.

A. L., Texas, writes: "I have lately started playing in a new picture theater in this town and as this is my first experience in this line of business I wish you would tell me what kind of music I will need and some pointers as how to use it. The work interests me very much and I am desirous to do it right so any advice you can offer will be gratefully received."

These letters are always interesting to me from their simplicity. The writers are in the same boat with myself and many others. They want to know." Now, the best I or any one can do is to offer a personal opinion on the subject. The rest is largely a matter of your own application, experience and individuality. In previous articles on this page I have endeavored to set forth my ideas as to the fundamental principles of the application of music to the pictures, but any suggestions along this line must, from the nature of the work, be general in character. As I have frequently pointed out, there can be no definite rules laid down which will apply to all pictures alike, for the reason that there is no limit to the possibilities of pictorial subjects and their treatment. Each one presents its own peculiar problems of musical definition, and nearly every musician who has any ideas at all, has his own methods of handling these problems. Most of them perhaps all have some good in them, but in the present chaotic state of picture music it is unwise for any one to insist that his is the only correct "system" and all others are wrong.

Some time ago I visited a picture theater where a pianist held forth who had a reputation for "catching every move" on the screen. They said "he never let anything get by him." The first picture was a comedy. Music: "Oh You Kid," "Some of These Days," "My Wife's Gone to the Country," etc., all through. Sometimes only a few bars, sometimes a whole strain or more. Every thing applied perfectly; so well in fact that it would have been difficult to improve upon it. I said to myself, "This pianist is all right." The next picture was a rural comedy-drama of the present time. Music: "Barn Dance," "Ruben, Ruben," "Silver Moon," "Who Are You With Tonight," etc., etc. Still very good. Everything fitted and the audience was kept in a good humor. The last picture was of the ancient Roman period. Music opened with a modern waltz. Cleopatra goes up to the boat: "So Long, Mary." The boat moves away: "I Don't Know Where I'm Going, But I'm on My Way." Later, she is discovered sleeping surrounded by slaves waving palm branches over her: "Please Go 'Way and Let Me Sleep." And so on ad libitum. He certainly "caught every move," and I don't think anything "got by him," but he did not work up the picture as it should have been done.

Such pictures are serious, and a vein of levity in the musical accompaniment destroys their dramatic value whether the audience realized the fact or not. In this case, everybody appeared to be satisfied, but the picture was not presented in the spirit the producer intended it to be, and for that reason the audience did not get what they were entitled to. There wasn't the suggestion of a laugh in the whole film, nor was it necessary to introduce one. The other two reels had enough comedy to balance up the evening's bill, and the effect as given on this night was the same as when an actor "gags" his part. The piece was spoiled.

One thing I have always maintained is the necessity of getting the spirit of the picture—the impression you think the producer intended to convey, and then bring that out as well as you can. If the picture is comic, then any laugh you help to get carries out the purpose of the producer. Dramas may have both serious and comic elements; very often these may be introduced where none was intended, without detracting from the general idea, but it must not interfere with a serious scene or one of importance.

"What kind of music will be needed?" is another very natural question. Every kind of music may possibly be used at some time or other, from grand opera to "rag-time"; from the classic sacred music to the Salvation Army hymns. There is no limit to what you might need or could use on occasion. Luckily for our purposes, the average pictures run so nearly along the same lines that a little careful observation will show us what is most frequently called for. I do not believe it necessary at present to again mention the music ordinarily required, as I have gone over the routine frequently. Those who wish may find plenty of hints along this line by consulting the back numbers of The Moving Picture World.

The last request: "Give me some pointers on how to use it" (i.e., how to use the music) is the one big question which involves all the others. It is equivalent to asking "how shall I work up pictures." To some it comes natural to apply dramatic music to scenes. Other nimble witted players find the song chorus with its suggestive title or "catch phrase" to be a convenient form of describing pictures. Both are good, but neither should be used to the exclusion of the other. The latter needs no explanation. The principal requirements are a large stock of up-to-date popular stuff stored in your memory and a ready wit. Practice, however, works wonders in this as in everything else. As to applying dramatic music to the scenes, practice is also an important factor—the more you do, the easier it is. Here also exists the necessity of memorizing a number of pieces of this character (dramatic music). In fact one cannot "work up" pictures with any degree of satisfaction unless they have a considerable quantity of ordinary music "in their noddles and at their fingers' ends" as one correspondent put it.

Some time ago a young lady inquired as to the proper manner of applying dramatic music to pictures. I advised her as a beginner to pick out those scenes which she was sure of—that is, scenes so pronounced that there could be no mistaking their character, and fit them only at first. Later as she got more accustomed to this kind of work, she would be able to go further. She wrote me a short time ago that she had followed my suggestion and was getting along exceedingly well. Said she could see things in the pictures she never could see before. Of course as is to be expected, one develops with practice and learns in a measure to analyze pictures as to their dramatic elements—the application of fitting music follows as a matter of course. Your work will be elaborated by introducing "local color" in the shape of songs peculiar to place, to time or to people; by introducing (wherever appropriate) up-to-date song choruses. National and patriotic songs, of course, have their place and must not be overlooked.

In the case of the "Cleopatra" picture referred to above, although we have nothing which could be called "Early Roman" or "Ancient Egyptian" music, yet there is much characteristic and descriptive stuff which will answer the purpose. The march from "Aida" (Verdi) and "Antony and Cleopatra" (Grunewald) are both broad and dignified marches and are good for processionals as well as for "fill-in" purposes. Pryors "Egyptian Love Dance, "Lorraine's "Salome," "Zallah" the intermezzo "Iris," Beethoven's "March from the Ruins of Athens" (sometimes called Turkish March); Schubert's "Moments Musical" and many others can be used which by their quaint character will serve as a musical background for this class of picture. Use dramatic music also when necessary, but no popular songs or "up-to-date" stuff whatsoever, as the ancient atmosphere is essential to the picture.

It ought to be apparent to anybody that no one "system" or method of playing to pictures will apply to all alike. The song chorus idea as played to the comedy and comedy drama above mentioned was admirable; but when applied to the classic picture it was execrable.

A MONSTER MOVING PICTURE HOUSE.

The Madison Square Garden building in New York has for years been a financial problem. The great building has proved too useful to be dispensed with, yet the fact that it was unprofitable made its possible destruction almost an imperative solution of the dilemma. During the fall, winter and early spring, the "Garden" is always fully occupied. The four months of summer have proved the "white elephant" period of the big building. Many proposals tending to secure for the benefit of the people this useful structure have each in turn failed. The moving picture now comes to the rescue! It is proposed to use the large auditorium as a moving picture house, with a women's orchestra and other attractions, and it is expected to solve the problem. The most noticeable part of the announcement is that "every precaution will be taken to keep the high standard of shows and exhibitions for which the Garden is famous." Besides solving the financial problem of the Garden, it is possible that an opportunity now presents itself to give impetus to the value of the moving picture in other directions; from such a source and center an institutional sort of cinematography may develop. From the winter may come the fact that the movement may prove that its originators "builded better than they thought."

THE MOTIOGRAPH WATCH FOB.

We desire to call the attention of our readers this week to the advertisement of the Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co., which appears in this issue, in which they offer free to every manager and operator of a motion picture theater a very attractive watch fob; besides being a souvenir, it makes a splendid gift and a useful one. It is unique in design, attractive and rich in appearance, and it is the wish of the Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co. for the readers of this paper to take advantage of this offer, as they have gone to considerable expense to make this fob one of the best which has ever been offered as a souvenir in this country.

As will be seen by the illustration in their advertisement, this fob illustrates the motiograph motion picture machine, and on the reverse side in neat lettering is only the name of the makers, and no one could have an objection to wearing as handsome and useful a souvenir as this, particularly at this season of the year when the weather necessitates the discarding of heavy clothing.

As the 1911 catalog issued by this company is now ready for distribution, they will be glad to send one to any one interested.

The Yankee Film Company has substituted "The Pretender" in place of its release, "His Romance," as advertised last week.

who was reported missing on Broadway last Thursday. Friends found him happy and contented at the Rex Studio; he told them that Rex is in the kidnapping business and that he wished he had been kidnapped sooner. He was very busy manufacturing laughs for his initial appearance which is in a reel to be released June 1st, entitled

"THE MONOGRAM J. O."

A late report on Broadway has it that Wm. A. Brady, Chas. Frohman, Klaw & Erlanger, and the rest of Rex's competitors have hired Pinkertons to watch Rex.

YOU KEEP YOUR EYE ON REX AS WELL!

QUESTIONS ON LAST WEEK'S LSSSON.

1. Why does the intensity of illumination decrease as an open source of light is moved away from the eye?

2. Given a light placed a certain distance from an aperture and a screen on the opposite side of the aperture, the area of the light on a screen increases as the screen is moved away. Why?

3. What effect on intensity of illumination has moving the screen back and why?

4. What is a light compared to in measuring its intensity?

5. In what proportion does intensity of illumination decrease as the screen is moved away from an open light?

This comparison is made with what is known as a Photometer, of which there are several types.

In Fig. 10 is illustrated what is known as Rumford's Photometer, to which A B represents the two sources of light to be compared, B being the source to be measured and A the standard candle used in measuring. C is a round rod (any other shape is just as good) which casts two shadows on screen, D. E being the shadow caused by B and F that caused by A.

We set B in at any convenient distance from D, placing rod C quite close to screen D, so that the shadows will be side by side. The lights are so placed that the flame of A illuminates the shadow cast by B, and B illuminates the shadow cast by A. We now move A and B to and from D until the shadows appear of equal density. Let us suppose that we find the shadows to be of equal density when light A is ten inches and light B thirty inches from the screen. Remembering that the light, or illuminating power decreases inversely with the distance we must square the distances (10 inches), that A is removed from the screen by multiplying ten by itself, which gives one hundred. Next we square thirty in like manner, result 900. Next we divide 900 by 100, the result being nine, which is number of times B is stronger than A.

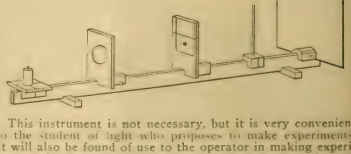
To recapitulate: To find the candle power of light B we proceed as directed in the arrangement of screen and other apparatus. We then arrange the two lights we propose to compare in manner indicated by sketch B and advance A toward the screen, at the same time removing B to greater distance, until the two shadows appear exactly alike in density. Measure distance from the screen and from B to the screen. Square both measurements by multiplying them by themselves and wind up by dividing the square of B distance by the square of A distance. The result will be the one sought, viz. the times stronger light B is than light A and, if light A is a standard candle, the candle power of light B. For example, let us assume that light A is a standard candle. Let us also assume that we find the shadows to be of equal density when light A is ten inches and light B sixty inches from the screen. 10 x 10 equals 100, while 60 x 60 equals 3,600. 3,600 divided by 100 equals 36, the answer. We therefore conclude that, in the example, light B is thirty-six times stronger than light A. Since light A is a standard candle it follows that light B is 36 candle power. In other words, it would require thirty-six candles such as A to produce illumination equal to that given off by light B.

It might be well, at this point to give a somewhat more clear idea of the general meaning of the rule that light intensity diminishes with the square of the distance. If we call the illumination produced at one foot 1, the illumination at two feet will be but one-fourth, if the distance be three feet the illumination will be one-ninth, while if it be ten feet the light intensity will be but one-one-hundredth, and so on. This, to sum up the meaning of the law of inverse squares as applied to light. Let it be understood, however, that the law applies only to an open light such as is shown in Fig. 8. Let it also be understood that, strictly speaking, the law applies only to light emanating from a point; that is to say, it does not hold strictly, or, rather, accurately true, where the light emanates from some source, such, for instance, as a candle flame, large enough to have many points on its surface, each of which is sending out rays in every direction. Practically, however, we treat the law of inverse squares as though it held true for all light sources.

And now to return to our subject. The Rumford photometer has already been described. Bunsen's photometer is also a practical device and one perhaps more easily applied by the operator than Rumford's would be. Make a grease spot on a clean square of white paper, by dropping on its surface a drop of wax from a candle; removing same with a knife when cold.

You will immediately see that this spot is much more translucent than is the surrounding paper, when held between the light and the eye. If, however, the paper be held against something dark the spot will appear darker than the surrounding paper. The spot allows more light to pass than does the surrounding paper, but it diffuses much less. Now if you hold the sheet of paper just half way between two sources of light having equal power you will discover that the spot is no longer visible. The relative transparency and diffusion of the spot and paper have neutralized and the spot cannot be distinguished from its surroundings. For instance, to verify: In a dark room having two sources of light, electric, kerosene, gas or candle, each of equal power, hold the paper with spot nearer one light than the other. Looking at it towards the nearer candle the spot appears brighter than its surroundings. Now as the paper is moved toward its observer the spot gradually fades, finally disappearing altogether, or nearly so. If the movement is continued toward the observer the spot will grow darker after the point of equal illumination has been passed. The application of this test is precisely the same as in the Rumford photometer. Find the neutral point and measure the exact distance from paper to each light. Square the two measurements and divide the greater by the less as before.

For many experiments what is known as an "optical bench" is very convenient. Such a bench is shown in Fig. 11.



This instrument is not necessary, but it is very convenient to the student of light who proposes to make experiments. It will also be found of use to the operator in making experiments with lenses. The horizontal, or base bar may be, and should be, laid off in inches, halves and quarters of an inch; also by feet.

Live Question.—Iowa (name of town suppressed) writes: "I noticed in a recent issue of the 'World' that one of the correspondents intimated in so he his belief that there is little use of a Trouble Department. He seemed to think that if one paid money enough he could get expert service in the operating line. I also noted your reply to the gentleman, which was very good. I now desire to make a few remarks about myself. One year ago I opened a small house in this little city of 1,200 population. By careful management I have 'made it go,' though, as you may imagine, the profit has not been large. It is my opinion, however, that had it not been for the Moving Picture World I could not have kept the house open and most certainly I would not have been able to give the people of this village the excellent show I have given them, and they in the end would have been the sufferers. By running my own machine, my wife acting as ca hier, my daughter playing the piano and our boy taking tickets, we managed to give this little town a really creditable moving picture show. If I were obliged to hire a first-class operator it simply could not be done and that is all there is to it. In a town of 1,200 there is not enough income to justify the expense of the salary of a first-class operator. If I had to pay the salary of any kind of an operator I would have to take just that much off the film service and my patrons would be the losers, even supposing I could keep my house open. Now, I believe there are thousands of other small exhibitors placed just exactly as I am and to them the World is a God-send. Thousands upon thousands and even hundreds of thousands of people in small towns have absolutely no other form of theatrical amusement except that furnished by the little moving picture show run on about the same basis as my own. Anything that injures the performance in these theaters injures the enjoyment of the vast multitude of citizens in our small towns. It, therefore, seems to me that whatever helps these small shows to put on a better performance, or keep their house open and furnish the people amusement, is distinctly good. Moreover, it indirectly helps the film exchange, manufacturer, and everything connected with the business. As for myself, I consider that I owe my business very largely to the Moving Picture World and the Trouble Department, through the medium of which I have in the past year learned to give what I believe is very good projection, a thing I could not possibly have done without some help of that kind, and so far as I have seen aid of that sort is available nowhere except through the columns of the 'Moving Picture World' and in your Handbook."

I believe the above letter needs very little comment except to say that what the brother says is true.

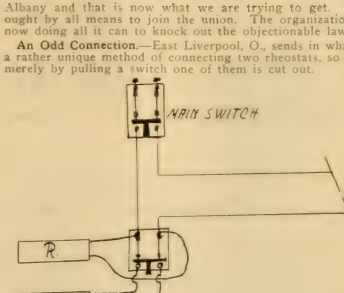
Air Dome Curtain.—Madison, Neb., writes: "I am a constant reader of the 'World' and enjoy every word of it. I am planning to start an air dome for the summer and I want to know what is the most suitable fabric to obtain. Also what preparation should be used to coat same. Some tell me it should be coated with aluminum, while others tell me it should be as white as possible. Please give me your opinion."

An airdome curtain may be made in a number of ways. It may be of bleached muslin and either taken down each night or else built with a hood for the protection from inclement weather. I do not, however, advise this form of curtain for an airdome. My own idea of the proposition is to build a suitable frame with a hood extending out so as to protect the curtain from the moonlight. I would then cover the picture space with lath and plaster, with hard plaster, finishing with a cement coat. I would then paint the inside of the hood black and the cement surface I would cover with a paint as follows: white lead, mixed with half oil and half turpentine for the first two coats, which should be applied tolerably thin; and about one-third oil and two-thirds turpentine for the finishing coat. To this paint I would add a little ultra marine blue, enough so that it has quite a bluish tinge in the bucket. It will then be dead white on the screen. Such a curtain will not be injured by the weather, it will last the whole season without repainting and is not very expensive. The only possible objection is that it would have to be firmly braced to withstand the pressure of wind. The hood should extend out far enough to shade the curtain completely from the moonlight and it should also extend out at the sides of the curtain a little for the same purpose, though not enough to interfere with the view of the audience. You can also get a fairly satisfactory curtain by using sheet metal instead of cement plaster, painting it in the same way, except that the first coat should be yellow ochre to prevent white lead from directly on metal, as it will corrode. The cement could be coated with aluminum instead of paint if desired, of course.

License for Aliens.—New York City writes: "As one of the readers of the 'World,' I wish to express my thanks for the splendid work put forth for the benefit of operators. The Department has been very valuable to me. I am one of those non-citizens whose license expires the 15th of this month. Would you advise me whether or not there is any chance for us non-citizen operators to procure New York licenses? I heard that the case is before the Legislature in Albany. Is that true? Also, is it necessary that we should have a license to operate in New Jersey? Should I join Local 35, N. Y. M. P. M. O. Union; do you think they could help me in this matter?"

There is now before the Legislature in Albany a bill designed to put an end to the depriving a man of the right to work unless he is a citizen. Whether the bill will get through this session of legislature or not and be signed by the Governor, we, of course, cannot say, but we shall know very soon. I believe there is no license necessary to operate in New Jersey. The alien operator law was an outrage from the beginning, as I have before said. It is, however, a waste of space to talk about it. The thing we need to screw up in Albany and that is now what we are trying to get. You ought by all means to join the union. The organization is now doing all it can to knock out the objectionable law.

An Odd Connection.—East Liverpool, O., sends in what is a rather unique method of connecting two rheostats, so that merely by pulling a switch one of them is cut out.



As will be readily seen, when the switch is closed the two rheostats are working in multiple. There is no question but what the connection would work all right. East Liverpool wishes to know if there is an operators' union in New York under the jurisdiction of the I. B. E. W. There is not. New York operators are organized under the I. A. T. S. E.

Position Wanted.—Mr. Wm. Royal, Harrisburg, Pa., desires a position. Mr. Royal refers to Capt. J. G. Ferari, now running the trained wild animal show at Dreamland Park, Coney Island, or to A. L. Roumford & Co. Mr. Royal writes an excellent letter and presumably can deliver the goods. In this connection I wish to say that as summer comes on applications for positions are multiplying. I am obliged, however, to turn down the proposition of securing positions for operators. I tried it and it was not at all satisfactory. Some men, after a lot of trouble was taken on both sides, refused to take positions offered. Other men took positions and could not make good. Of course, I can have no personal knowledge of the work of operators situated, perhaps, hundreds of miles away, or even those quite close, unless I happen to see their work. I would be only too glad to be able to help the boys in every possible way, but I find that securing positions is not a feasible proposition. Sorry, gentlemen, but I have tried it and it doesn't work.

License Law Wanted.—Mobile, Ala., writes: "Would you kindly give me the moving picture casualty record for the United States during the past two or three years. We have the matter of a license law up with the City Fathers. We wish them to pass an ordinance requiring the examination of operators. The bill is opposed by some of our local managers. Is it necessary that operators be examined in New York City? If so, who examines them? What is the charge for the license? The bill is laid over until we hear from you."

I have no authentic figures at hand concerning the casualties in moving picture theaters in the United States during the past two years. I may say, however, that as a matter of fact, the casualties during the past two years have amounted to practically nothing, though there has been heavy loss of life in two or three instances in foreign countries. This occurred, however, not in moving picture theaters, but in temporary shows given in one instance in an immense barn like structure, totally unfit for moving picture theater and not equipped in any way for the purpose it was being used for. The law is very strict here in New York City, also in Chicago and practically all other large cities. The operators must in all cases be examined and licensed. They are usually examined by the electrical department of the city, or by an operators' examining board appointed for the purpose. There is no charge at all for the license in New York City, but in Chicago it is $10 per year. The city of Mobile should by all means examine and license its operators. Notwithstanding the fact that there have been practically no casualties, there is nevertheless an exist ent danger of fire, also it is due to the public that they be, so far as possible, protected from the inexpert work of ignoramuses who pose as operators. I do not know whether you have any of that brand in Mobile or not, but if you have you are indeed fortunate. The manager who suppose the running of operators are doing so, I believe, from a totally mistaken viewpoint. The licensing of operators in New York City, Chicago and other cities has in no instance worked any hard

A General Letter.—A traveling operator writes: "I am one of those who perused your remarks in the World, wherever I am able to secure a copy of same. This does not happen every week, as I am traveling from place to place. There is one statement, page 1056, May 14th issue, signed by Milwaukee, which is a little too strong for me to let pass. While he is entirely correct in saying the picture shows of Milwaukee are good, he is also entirely in error when he says that they are the best in this country. I have been traveling with a road show ever since the A. F. of L. has the privilege of advertising Union Labels in various crafts affiliated and have traversed the country from Galveston to Canada and from Philadelphia to Denver. I believe I may say without fear of successful contradiction that St. Louis picture shows give the public more for their money than Milwaukee does or possibly can do. Another matter I wish to mention is in regard to the letter signed Ohio and your reply to same. You observe the very greatest praise for such an answer. Although the name of the town was withheld, I can safely guess it. For your own special benefit I will say that the I. A. T. S. E. of the city I have in mind makes me ashamed that I myself carry a card in that organization (as well as two others). They have allowed traveling moving picture men to work in one of the theaters there with a non-union operator, property man and musician; a thing entirely contrary to the rules of the organization. In the answer you make however, one statement is incorrect, namely when you say the preachers are organized. The preachers are absolutely unorganized. Result, the average yearly wage is only $300. Also one fact that you did not mention is that the doctors' union and the lawyers' union have a very rigid scale of wages, which provides for overtime and also governs the supreme service by a very high standard. The Funeral Directors' Union (association) is so strenuous in the enforcement of its wage scale that in Cincinnati, O., if a poor man loses a child, for instance, and before he is able to finish paying for the first one a second dies, the second one will not be buried by any undertaker in that city until the first bill is entirely paid—and that is right.

I have published practically all the letter for the very simple reason that there are those who are inclined to strenuously oppose the organization of operators. What the neighbor says is absolutely true. The Funeral Directors' Union (they call it association) is, to my mind, one of the most outrageous combinations in this country, yet one is prone to criticise them very seriously because they are "business men." Yet I myself have known of instances where the Funeral Directors' Union has refused to bury a corpse because the bill for a former funeral was not yet entirely paid, and the city authorities had to step in and compel the interment by threatening to take away the license of a few of the members of the Funeral Directors' Union unless the body received interment. What the neighbor says about the lawyers' and doctors' unions is also true, and I was under the impression that the preachers also had a union, though I may be mistaken. Observe my calling all these organizations unions. I want to impress upon you, Mr. Exhibitor, the fact that all these various organizations of professional and business men, bearing high-sounding titles, are nothing more or less than unions, so why draw the line at the operator?

Interesting Letter.—San Francisco, Cal., contributes the following: "I will endeavor to write you the promised letter to the best of my own limited knowledge, make no jokes and do general stunts on a broad shelf running along on the front of the booth, always keeping the screen in view, with a perfect picture, a good light and a pleased audience. As to the light, I will give you my equipment and its details. I get a fine light, or at least the same results as D. C. from straight A. C., with hardly a particle of noise at the arc. The curtain results are even better than by the use of a rectifier. For my main lead, 110 volts, I use 60 ampere fuses. No. 6 wires to the lamp (all Powers No. 6 equipment). For resistance I use an upright coil 22 inches high, 6 inches in diameter, 4 inch square core, with strap for adjustment. It is giving 33 amperes, being wound with No. 4 magnet wire. The light costs 56 cents for eight hours' run; 56 lbs carbons top and bottom, set at 30 deg.; the carbons to line with each other except that the bottom one is slightly advanced. I remove the hook from the body of the lamp mount to get the 30 degree angle; also dropped the pin in the post 1½ inch, which allows nearly 4 inches of up and down adjustment. I took out of rack bars to get full use of them and can now use 6 inch carbon below and 12-inch in top, with hand never closed down. I can thus run eight or nine reels on one carbon setting. Have a 56-foot house, to by 13 picture, aluminum screen on smooth plastered wall. Use 9 inch condenser in the rear and 6½-inch in front, set 13 inches from the aperture. The spot is round and white. I am using the same two condensers I opened up with six months ago. We run with the house lights on and the picture is bright, perfectly clear to the corners and not a sign of ghost. I have no flicker whatever. In closing I wish to note just one thing, namely the picture in passing from the film to the rear combination of the objective is reduced to 1¼ by 1 inches in a distance of three inches and is shown right side up. What is the answer?"

I believe Fraser's letter requires no comment other than to say that I am always glad to hear from those who are producing the goods on the screen. As to the picture being reduced in size and shown right side up on the back end of the objective, he will see another letter on the same subject this week. I don't just understand about the current. You say you are using 33 amperes at 110 volts. This would be 3630 watts per hour or about 29 kw. in eight hours. Unless you are wrong you are getting current at about 2 cents per kw., which seems utterly impossible.

Commission.—Palenno, N. D., writes, asking that I secure him a position, offering to pay $10 or more for the service out of his salary after the position is secured.

In the first place, I have already made some remarks in another part of this week's Department concerning the matter of securing positions for operators. In the second place, I do not under any circumstances accept any commissions for anything of that kind. If I happen be in a position to place a man and I know the man can deliver the goods, all I ask of him is that he do so.

A New Stunt.—Mr. Harold Martin, New York City, comes in with the following: "In a large West Side school there is an exhibition of moving pictures once each week. This feature was instituted by the principal with the idea of providing a reward to pupils who are perfect in their deportment and studies and to keep them away from the nickelodeons at night. Every child having a certain average in studies and deportment for the week receives a card of admission to the show. Only one card is given to each child and no one is admitted without one of these tickets. One of the teachers graduated from an operators' school in this city and is now a licensed operator. The show is given in the school hall Monday afternoons for the girls and Tuesdays for the boys. Licensed films are used, the range of subjects covering industrial, scenic, trick, history and comic film. Since this plan was adopted the average in deportment and studies has been raised in a very remarkable degree. The child who has not earned an admission card feels disgraced and tries all the harder during the ensuing week. M tion pictures in this instance have become a method of training as well as instruction and amusement."

The plan outlined is unique and, I should presume, would be very valuable from any and every point of view. That it will, to a very appreciable extent, keep children away from the regular moving picture theaters is to be doubted, but it will enable them to see selected historic, industrial and other instructive films, as well as comic and trick pictures, under the very best conditions, accompanied, presumably by a lecture. More than this, making admission contingent upon a certain average in deportment and studies will in itself undoubtedly exercise a decided effect, both in the general deportment and general average of studies. In all probability the average child would work like a Trojan to secure such a card of admission. The child will not stop to consider that its monetary value is slight; the only thing it considers is the fact that unless the card be secured the shows which his companions who have attained the necessary degree in deportment and studies will be admitted must be missed. Such an influence is powerful beyond all proportion to its value as represented by the standards of money. The editor of this department believes that such a scheme could be inaugurated with immense benefit in every public school in our cities and possibly even in our smaller towns. He does not believe that the workings of such a plan would in any way operate to injure the business of the regular moving picture theaters. In smaller cities it might be entirely feasible for the school principal to make some sort of an arrangement with the local moving picture theater. Just how the financial end of it could be worked out would be a matter requiring considerable thought, but no doubt it could be arranged. The theater on the school day would have, of course, to give a strictly educational, historic, industrial and comic show, on which the principal of the school might lecture. It would require considerable working out of detail and careful arranging to make the plan work smoothly, but it is, I believe, entirely practical and would be of unquestionable, and possibly quite large, value to the schools.

Transformer Puzzle.—Wilmington, N. C., writes: "I am turning over to you a puzzle that I have been trying to make out for the past three months, as has also the Superintendent of the Electrical Department of this city. We have one of the Ft. Wayne compensators, which they say is not as it ought to be. We have tested out its contacts as follows: The first point is supposed to give 30 amperes; second point, 40 amperes; third point, 60 amperes. When we tested it out in operation, the actual readings were: First point, 25 amperes, voltage at arc 35; second point, 36 amperes, 37 volts at arc; third point, 55 amperes, 40 volts at arc, the line voltage at the time of the test being 116. Now, 55 amperes is too much for the lamp, whereas the second point only gives 36 and that is not enough for my 60-foot throw. We have received from the Ft. Wayne Company two of these devices, both giving the same results. If you can tell me any method of remedying this state of affairs I will be very thankful."

In the first place, Wilmington, from what you say, I should suppose you are using a transformer designed to work on 125 volts and are also using the same on a pressure of 115. If you gave the Ft. Wayne Company the proper voltage, namely 115 (you say 116, but presumably the actual pressure is carried at 115), and the transformers do not deliver their rated capacity, as claimed by the manufacturer, then it is up to the Ft. Wayne Company to provide you with transformers which will, and I have no doubt they will do so. The amperage could be raised by adding more turns of wire to the primary coils or by taking some off of the secondary turns. This, however, is a difficult task and you must not undertake any such operation, since even if you could perform it successfully you might run into other difficulties, the core probably being designed for exactly the number of turns it carries. I wish to correct you, however, on a couple of points, namely: Your throw has little to do with the amount of light required, it being the size of the picture which governs the amount of light necessary. If you have a good-sized picture, 55 amperes alternating will be none too much. As for myself, I use that much or more A. C. on anything above a 12-foot picture. I think there is nothing further I can say to you which will be of value. In order to have the compensators changed it must be returned to the factory.

A Few Questions.—Mr. J. H. Snively, Paris, Tex., writes: "Enclosed find $1.50 for the Handbook. I am a student of your department and by close study of its columns have been able to solve many perplexing problems which have stumped me many times in the past eight years. I have been an operator and exhibitor for that length of time. I am putting in a white plaster screen and wish to ask you the following questions: (a) Please advise me what I must use to kill the snow white glare of the plaster? (b) What size field will I get from a No. 2 Edison lense at 60 feet? Also a No. 3? (c) Can I buy a better grade lens that is offered by the Edison people as part of their regular machine equipment? (d) What size screen would be correct for a No. 3 stereo and No. 2 lens? (e) Can I have a stereo lens built that will project a field the exact size and shape of my M. P. field? (f) Is it practical to block out the mats of the slide so as to make a No. 2 stereo lens project a clean field the exact size and shape of the M. P. field? Question (e) you will doubtless think odd, but I wish to paint the outside border of my screen black and, of course, the slides would overlap the black and look bad."

(a) As for myself, Friend Snively, I would not care to kill the white. In fact, the whiter I can get the screen the better I like it. However, you may tone to suit by coating the plaster with white alabastine, to which has been added dry ultramarine blue to suit. Or, you can make the alabastine any color you may desire. (b) The No. 2 lens will project a picture 10½ feet wide at 60 feet and the No. 3 at the same distance will project a 10½ picture. These measurements cannot be depended upon absolutely; they are approximately correct, however. (c) Yes, you can buy a better grade of lens, but I hardly think it will pay you to do it, provided the lens supplied by the Edison people gives good, sharp definition all over the screen. If it does not, send it back and make them furnish one that will. You can, of course, get lenses up as high as $200 or $300, but the effect on the screen will be nowhere commensurate with the added price. (d) The No. 2 stereopticon lens would give you a picture about 10 feet square at 60 feet, and that would of course be the size to make your curtain, since the M. P. would be considerably smaller. (e) No, it is not practical to have a stereopticon lens built that way. The nearest you could come to it in practice would be to get a moving picture lens of long enough focus to project a picture only as big a square as your moving picture is high. (f) You could, of course, put a metal mat in your slide carrier of such size and shape that your stereopticon lens would throw a picture the same size and shape as the moving picture. By so doing, you would, however, block out considerable of the slide, and in many instances you would find the body of a person would be there all right, but their head would be behind the metal mat and the audience would be regaled with the spectacle of a headless man or woman. I would suggest that, provided it is possible, you rig a light rolling screen of bleached muslin, arranging so as to drop in front of your moving picture curtain, upon which to project the stereopticon pictures. This may be done by running the ropes up through the garret, if there is one, or down through the basement and to the operating room. The curtain could then be manipulated by the operator even though he is 70 feet away. I know of one theater in which such an arrangement is in effect, and the operator by means of a windlass in the operating room 110 feet away manipulates a curtain, the wires running from the top of the roller of the curtain down through the stage floor into the basement, through pipes to the front of the theater and up through pipes into the operating room where they pass around a windlass. The thing works perfectly.

That Light Question Again.—Washington, D. C., writes "In nosing around my Edison Type 'B' machine I discovered that by bringing the framing lever half way down, there is a little peep-hole at the top of the gate just to the left of the top of the latch. In looking through this opening when the machine is running I discovered something, the why and wherefore of which I cannot get through my head, unless the accompanying sketch is the explanation Parts 1 and 2 in the sketch are supposed to be the two glasses composing the back factor of the objective lens, though I have exaggerated the distance between them so as to get the figure on the second part. In looking at the lens through the little peep-hole I can see three clear and distinct pictures as shown in the drawing marked 1, 2 and 3, 1 and 2 are right side up colors miss the right side up and about half an inch long, number 3, however, is upside down and about one inch long. Now, according to that, the picture must be turned over the third time when it reaches the curtain. This phenomenon may be observed with any Edison type 'B' machine, but it is very hard on the eyes. The pictures are there just as I have indicated them, and all sharp and clear. I have been unable to find any data or drawings anywhere offering the slightest explanation of this phenomenon and I should like to know a little more about it. I always had the idea that the picture was just turned half over, but this seems to put that idea in the wrong. The Handbook was received some time since and I have read it through and through. In my judgment, an operator ought to be obliged to study one before being granted a license."

As you no doubt have noted, Washington, I am at present engaged in preparing a series of lessons on light, which are now running in the department each week. In the course of time we shall get to the lens proposition, when a lot of these things will be duly treated in a way to answer. But the images you see are caused by reflection, and same to the light lessons I am now just about to begin on that subject, you may in the course of a few weeks be able to dope out the meaning of their images and their explanation. Meanwhile possess yourself with patience. Washington. Glad to hear from you further at any time on any subject of interest.

A Correction.—Mr. A. Heath, Boston, writes: "I wish to make a correction in the drawing of the screen published last week. I inserted in the sketch 220 reverse instead of 110, which accounts for my mentioning the fact that both positive sides of the line should be on the theatre to prevent short circuit in the case of grounds. The one would work all right, but should a ground occur on a reverse it would very likely put both lamps out. In reply to Heather Morgan, I will say I overlooked your statement that both sides of the switch should be in motion to light both lamps. As it was, I considered that the general wiring was in the basement, the single switch representing the main switch and each lamp having a separate switch and cut-out, which would eliminate all danger of grounds, thinks etc."

Your apology is accepted, Brother Heath, though I find no error in connection to your sketch. I will probably spend Sunday in Boston on the next trip and would be very glad to meet yourself and some of the Boston boys.

Licensed.

"The Still Alarm" (Selig).—This is a fairly well-executed melodrama that improves very effective toward its later scenes. Not all that goes on in the picture is clear, but the main thread is quite apparent. Its feature, the fire with a rescue and a still alarm after the villain has set the house, is a fine piece of work. It probably will make the picture as popular among those as Joseph Arthur's fine melodrama of the same name once was back among plays. The acting of the principals is almost what is commendable. The lover, Jack Manly, is played by Tom Lingham. Eugenie Besserer makes an effective heroine. Frank Richard takes the part of her father, and Bessie Rawlinson is the villain. The last scene is very pretty and effective. It is well photographed.

"Paul and Francesca" (Pathe).—The romance of these famous lovers has been made the subject of many poetical stories. This version turns on the desire for vengeance of Lanciotto's sister for and the play's chief weakness is its failure to show the cause of this so that we also might learn his guilt. It makes a very pretty picture, well-acted and interesting. It takes place in Italy during the Renaissance, about 1500 A. D. The setting shows up the colors of the silken garments remarkably well. The play can not be said to grip the emotions powerfully.

"Her Humble Ministry" (Lubin).—This is one of the most widely sandwiched films with a religious motif that this reviewer has yet seen. It will "take" strongly with audiences. The situation is poignantly true of human experience, and to find any fault seems a pity; few will notice its short-comings. Still, it would have been better to have had the arrests ordered by a Gerry Society man. Then, good as are the scenes in the room of the tough young men, they fail to maintain the emotional impression of the earlier scenes, especially those in the Home with the Sisters of Charity. It is because these scenes are not nearly so true to life. The picture is, nevertheless, one of the most worthy of the week.

"A Case of High Treason" (Edison).—This picture is the poorest Edison film this reviewer has seen. It is a melodrama with scenes laid in San Domingo, and it lacks the art that the Edison Company usually puts into its pictures. The situation is stale and very hard to act, and though there is enough body to please mildly, this reviewer fears that most spectators will find it tiresome. The last scene seemed to lack art altogether. It seemed as flat as the illustration of some newspaper novel.

"The Welcome of the Unwelcome" (Vitagraph).—This pretty drama has a delightful school girl heroine. The unwelcome one is the new step-mother-to-be. Miss Grace Louis makes a very sprightly schoolgirl, who romantically applies for the job of lady's maid to the woman (Julia Swayne takes the part) whom her widower father loves. Van Dyke Brooke plays the father. It is a very pleasant, worthy comedy.

"The Carnival" (Kalem).—This is a drama of artistic life and people in Paris. The background is Bohemian, but a well-to-do Bohemia is pictured, not the Latin Quarter. In this story, it isn't the artist who deserts his family, but it's the mother who is irresolute. The producer was wise enough to use good paintings on the easels and to use good castes—strange, that one feels it necessary to comment upon such a point. The scenes are all interesting; the acting is excellent and the picture is likely to please. Its atmosphere suggests culture, even elegance.

"American Beauties" (Pathe).—This is a picture of a marvelous rose garden. A graceful girl poses under beautiful rose trees, smiles through frames of roses and gathers bouquets with artistic and graceful motions. The scenes are nicely colored.

"How the Hungry Man Was Fed" (Edison).—This is one of E. H. Davis's Van Bibber stories. Van B. makes a "starving" beggar eat. It comes hard, but the beggar puts the food into him. When he has finished, Van B. makes him pay and tip the waiter. The beggar has plenty of money. It's an educational film. There are some laughs and smiles in it; for the "hungry" man is a good actor. We wonder how long he cultivated the appetite to be able to punish those big potatoes.

"Country Lovers" (Biograph).—A very good chance was wasted in this film. It is theatrical and almost wholly unconvincing as it is. The personality of the six who act it is pleasing, but they have little chance to give human characterization to their parts. There is an amateurish tramp in the story. Still, now and then, the actors manage to bring out a ripple of laughter as the reel is being projected.

"Fishguard Harbor" (Urban-Eclipse).—This is a first class travel film, instructive and interesting. It shows one of the great liners from America entering the new harbor in Wales, and shows the disembarking and unloading. Many reporters seen in the crowds seem to indicate that it is the first great ship to land at the harbor.

"The Juggler's Vengeance" (Urban-Eclipse).—This is a dramatic picture, but it was not clear, at first, to this reviewer because he couldn't recognize the characters when dressed up for the show. It is well acted, but it is not a very significant or interesting film. It is a story of circus life.

"In and Around Havana, Cuba" (Edison).—This film shows interesting streets and buildings. It shows the caissons about the wreck of the U. S. S., Maine. It is a worthy educational number. The photography is clear and the photographer seems to have chosen the features that the public is most likely to be interested in.

"A Tragedy in Toyland" (Kalem).—Here is an interesting film, and the actors are a child's toys, except in the opening and closing scenes. It shows a battle with toy soldiers, a love affair which incites a duel, etc. To do this required 123,500 separate movements and separate exposures. A photographer devoted his entire time for three months to the work. The film is a success and will be popular.

"Billy in Trouble" (Pathe).—This is a broad farce in which Billy is represented as holding a girl so close in a dance that his wife, who sees the reflection in a mirror, objects. This causes much unpleasantness for Billy, but in the end all is well.

"In Blossom Time" (Kalem).—This is a very pretty romance and has scenes that are truly poetical—the one, for instance, where the lover tip-toes near and shakes the bough so that a shower of orange blossoms falls on the heroine's head. This heroine is a happy choice for the part. She acts with sympathy and is pretty. The man who takes the part of the Don is not very successful in his portrayal. Such a man would not put on a truculent look so often. Also it will be noticed that this play's romantic hero weeps. Why do they do it so often in such pictures? Aside from this, he plays the part well. If the father of the heroine is present at the wedding ceremony, as he seems to be, why does he go into such a fury later when he finds that his daughter is a mother? What does the priest say to him that calms him? The picture of the little mother and her child is one of the most poetical scenes given in some time. The play is, as a whole, commendable. The pictures are clear and very well selected, and the story worth while. The producer has grouped his characters well; one would think it all happened that way.

"The Show Girl" (Vitagraph).—This play has a very fine situation, but it isn't brought out as powerfully as it might have been. There is so much business in it that gets nowhere that when the climax comes part of its significance is lost. If we had seen Renfrew's wife and family in the very first scene we would more quickly have realized the possibilities of the situation. The scenes in the theater where Dr. Renfrew makes love to Audrey are quite clear. Yet, the friend who tells her that the doctor is a married man appears to compel her to return the pearls. Then, we don't see why Audrey stands peeping around the corner of the house and, later, when Mrs. Renfrew appears, we don't know who she is nor are we sure whose children run into the house. There was no need of this confusion, for the situation is quite simple. After all, "The Show Girl" makes a pretty play. The scene where she dances is good and, though, at the climax, we are not sure whether she leaves the pearls from play gave her little chance to show the state of mind underplay gave her little chance to show the states of mind underlying that act. She showed no wounded pride, no desire for revenge at any time. Just before the climax, while she was talking, Dr. Renfrew stood smiling so vaguely, we couldn't tell what she was saying.

"A Close Call" (Pathe).—In this melodrama only one actor is given a presentation before the curtain and it is hard to understand why he was chosen for this honor among the others. He plays his part of the hero well, but the other parts seem as well played. The feature of the play is a very exciting rescue. The heroine lies stunned on the track, left there by the gang. The engine approaches. It seems about to run over her when the hero, riding on the cowcatcher, bends down and saves her by picking her up. It is, or seems to be, no dummy he rescues. How it is done the spectator may not know, but it gives a "heart in the throat" moment. The play has its minor faults, but it is an exciting story and has several novel features. A fine greyhound is utilized to carry love-letters and in the moment of danger is given the message that brings help. Not to give away trade secrets, a smokeless fuel should be used in engines that play a prominent part in rescue scenes.

"Jimmy on a Lark" (Gaumont).—Jimmy seems to be the same little actor who took the part of the little King of Rome. His acting is, as all know, extremely good. In this play he changes places with a little gypsy and leaves the other boy at his father's chateau, in Prince and Pauper way. He acts humanly and it's good to see him. The other boy is just as good. We commend the play.

"Shooting the Rapids" (Gaumont).—These scenes are tinted and the rocky gorge through which the stream flows very rapidly is or seems to be red limestone. The boat with the passengers looks like a dory. It makes a speedy trip. The pictures are interesting and the film very commendable.

"The Crooked Road" (Biograph).—The apparent object of this drama is to preach a sermon upon the sorrows which accompany wrongdoing. A man lets his family be cared for by public charity. He awakes and begins a better life, but is unable to find them. His child enters a pawnshop, where he is making repairs, to pawn her mother's wedding ring, and through this the family is reunited. It is a story well told and gives a genuine tug at the heart strings.

"The Gambler's Chance" (Lubin).—This lively comedy is acted with the usual Lubin spirit and tells what good came from a boy's game of craps. The game delays the office boy and he is too late to deliver the package at the broker's. Meanwhile coffee goes way down on the market. In a bit of good acting the boy decides to go back and make a clean breast of it. The employer hardly deserved the good luck that saved his money. The picture will please because of the human nature in it.

"A Hero—Almost" (Lubin).—This comedy will keep them laughing. It tells the story of a romantic girl with two lovers. She will only marry a hero. The subject is not very fresh, but is lively and holds the attention from beginning to end.

"Stability vs. Nobility" (Selig).—This comedy doesn't come up to the recent Selig photoplays. It has a chase as the feature of the early scenes and this dimly contrasts the readiness of the two cowboys (the stability men) with the lackadaisical qualities of a count (the noble one). The feature of the second part is the awkwardness of these same two boys at a ball in New York contrasted with the savoir faire of the count, who thinks he has been insulted. Then there is the very stale duel scene with a comic ending. The picture has Selig photography, but Selig art is wanting. One would suppose that a different producer had turned it out.

"The Atonement" (Essanay).—The object of this picture is to create an impression of the moral quality in fate by showing how one man's lack of generosity left a door open through which harm came into his fireside. A cynic will say that the ill came through the wife's generosity. The wife did act with almost criminal foolishness and that is the weakness of the picture. The picture has emotional scenes, as when the rich man's only child lies dead, but it isn't as convincing as it might have been.

"Drifting" (Lubin).—This domestic story begins with a quarrel and a separation, and ends with a happy re-union after a lapse of years. The re-union leaves few dry eyes in the house, so closely does it touch the heart.

"Alkali Ike's Auto" (Essanay).—Here is a comedy that has more fun to the foot than any other release of that firm for a long time. It is the story of how Alkali Ike triumphs for a time in his automobile, then comes to grief. The audience roars with laughter from beginning to end. Perhaps that describes it sufficiently.

"The Redemption of Rawhide" (Melies).—A lively Western story, telling how the presence of a girl redeemed a wild mining town where drinking and gambling had previously reigned supreme.

"Sunshine and Shadow" (Vitagraph).—Here is a story of a little white girl called Sunshine and a little black girl called Shadow, in which the differences of station between the two are indelibly impressed upon the little black girl's mind. The scene where the little black one gets under the sofa while the party is in progress and has a beautiful doll thrust upon her is a fine bit of dramatic work.

"The Herders" (Selig).—The artistic qualities of all recent Selig pictures that this reviewer has seen have been very marked; they have a delightful individual quality. "The Herders" is another of these pictures and does its producer credit. It is not a very exciting story, nor is it romantic. It depends for its interest on pictures of actual life on the sheep range, but as has been said of W. D. Howells's novels, it is good, but nothing happens in it. Yet the first four scenes of it alone would make it worth while, and it is all beautiful. The acting is good. In fact, Wanna's attitude when Pedro first finds her in the saloon is a highly commendable piece of work.

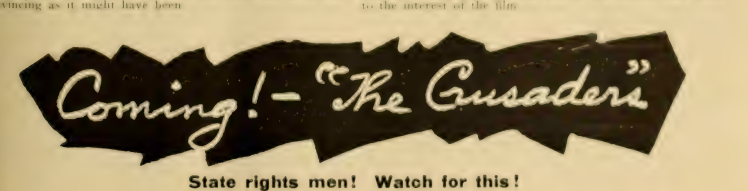
"Shooting the Rapids in Japan" (Pathe).—This tinted picture shows excellent photography of scenes in Japanese mountain country. It shows a boat with a number of passengers shooting the rapids of a beautiful stream. There is no apparent danger in the trip and the pictures are not so thrilling as they would have been had the photographer remained in the boat as at the start.

"Captain Nell" (Edison).—This story tells in an interesting way how a Salvation Army lassie saves a wayward young man, marries him and eventually makes a man of him. The story has much of heart interest and is told in a convincing way. Plainly the audience liked it.

"The Emperor's Return" (Gaumont).—Here is a picture based upon the return of Napoleon from Elba. A love story, with accompanying jealousy and charges of unfaithfulness. The best part of the picture is the scene where the Emperor arrives and is enthusiastically welcomed by his patriotic adherents. The photography is clear and the acting harmonizes well with the subject.

"Swans" (Gaumont).—This educational film shows swans building their nest, the young when they first appear, and the care with which the old birds watch them.

"A Dead Man's Honor" (Vitagraph).—We have here a touching and dramatic picture, showing how one man protected the honor of his brother, whom he finds is a bandit. The scenes where the brothers are insisting that each shall assume the blame for the hold-up are stirring and the emotions are deeply touched when the mother accepts the statement of the returning son that he is the wandering brother, and sinks back peacefully in the enjoyment of his supposed presence. It is a home picture, based upon homely scenes and contains homely characters. It goes direct to the heart and holds the attention of the audience throughout. The contrast between the desperate hold-up of the stage coach and the peaceful look on the face of the mother adds much to the interest of the film.



INDEPENDENT.

"The Snow Maiden" (American).—This is an exceptionally fine picture from a standpoint of photography and has some exquisite scenics. It tells a love story symbolizing the coming of spring from the warmer valleys to the mountains. The love story of Snowdrop and Spring Blossom, the shepherd boy, is pretty. We notice a couple of misspelled words in the titles. We have called attention to this on several occasions.

"There's Many a Slip" (Vitagraph).—While there is very little originality to this comedy sketch, there is enough of it to enjoy it. The action is very good and the story is made clear at all times. Some of the actors and actresses in this reviewer talked to us. We are not pleased to take such pictures as this.

A Cowboy's Sacrifice" (American).—One of those simple Western dramas that will be popular. It tells a good story in a straightforward way and without complications. It tells of a cowboy who assumes blame for another's crime and goes to serve the penalty in his place. He almost reaches the end of his term when the guilty one confesses and the girl arrives with explanations that clear him of the charge. A Western picture of this type would not be complete without a wild ride and the girl performs it here. It is a good Western picture and is appreciated.

"The Angelus Bell" (Yankee).—As impressive picture is one of the most appealing scenes strong to be seen. A girl stands in the city with an artist painting on the step as she hears the Angelus bell, and she will not leave her father alone.

"The Sheriff's Captive" (American).—This is a Western drama which illustrates how the quick wit of a girl secures freedom for her husband, her father and herself. Some of the scenic and picturesque. The entire film is well worth seeing.

"The Postmistress" (Lux).—This is a story of a French postmistress' love for a man new in the village. She learns that he is "wanted" by the police and turns him over to them. The action takes place in the postoffice of a French village and the living room behind it. The background is more interesting than the story.

"Lady Clare" (Thanhouser).—This film reproduces Tennyson's poem in the true spirit of poetry and romance. The young lady who plays Lady Clare was a fortunate choice for the part and she gives more to the picture than any other character in it. Its atmosphere suggests Shakespeare rather than Tennyson, but that is a very small matter. We take pleasure in commending the film.

"Sonata of Souls" (Reliance).—This is a story of the sorrows of a genius who holds a very humble position as a servant. Musical reputation that she well deserves, love, everything for which she longs is kept from her and she dies. But the acting here is very poor, even that of the heroine, except in scenes where she shows despair, and the whole picture disappointing. Wigs are not very effective in a motion picture. Dreams that stand out in the middle of the room are not effective either; such trick-plays are too obvious, but not more so than such trick-plays as the substitution of one actor for another, as is also done in this play.

"In the Nick of Time" (Solax).—This is, truly, all kinds of a picture. Some of it is like a barnstormers melodrama, and one scene, where the men from the army post ride out to rescue the lost lieutenant, is like the end of a Buffalo Bill show, where all ride around the ring with the flag. For all they know, the lieutenant had suffered a sun-stroke, but the men most seemingly rides furiously out and with the flag. The picture isn't dignified, it demands too much of its spectators.

"The Cheyenne Medicine Man" (Bison).—After the Bison company's fine photo drama, "The Foreman's Bride," this play is astonishing. It is another of a series of Indian pictures this company has been releasing in which there are no white men. The setting of the first scene is the same Sioux village as in "The Chief's Defeat." With the titles, as given, this story wasn't clear to this reviewer. It has a charming scene, though not as beautiful a scene as its forerunner in the Lemon Light," by an associated company.

"An exception to the Rule" (Rex).—The Rex Company has some strong players. These worked hard to evoke comedy as they pictured this situation, but the laughing lines didn't come very often. The play has a very good plot, with a framework which is long sparkling and pleasing dialogue. The Rex players made the situation adequately clear, but the spectators laughed only three times. The husband's friend, the commercial traveler, was the only actor who made sense who watched the picture at the 14th Street Theater laugh. They laughed, not when the strong-armed girl knocked him down, but when he got up smiling. The second time was not when the wife's friend slapped him, but when he took it as a joke. The third laugh came in the last act in the house when the husband's friend was afraid that the wife's friend was about to, literally, "hand him another." Yet the picture was made in the Rex style, which is very good. There is a quality in Rex pictures that puts the poorest of them in the distinguished class.

"Two Girls Love Foolshead" (Italia).—Mr. Deed is a very good actor. He is funnier in this play than in any of his other parts that this reviewer has seen. He is very ably assisted by the two ladies who take the part of the lovers.

"With Sheridan at Murfreesboro" (Champion).—This war story deserved better treatment by the director. It is the story of a great spiritual struggle. The son sides with the North, the father with the South. Later the father is a prisoner in the camp of the son, when a letter arrives telling of the probable fatal illness of the mother. The son bids the father go. For it, he is courtmartialed and sentenced to be shot. As in a vision, we see at his wife's bedside the father seen at all and, hastening back, arrives in time to throw himself upon his son as the squad fires. Then the story is told to Gen Sheridan. The son is restored to his rank and the father released on parole. The story is so clear that the audience loses emotions. And at the close there is a burst of applause which betrays the appreciation of the story in spite of the unrealistic settings.

"The Forged Dispatch" (Imp).—A Memorial Day film, de luxe No. 2 of the Imp Co with grim war as an introduction and the tenderness of Memorial Day memories as a close. Love and jealousy influence one man to effect a friend's disgrace as a coward. This is done by forging an order to retreat. The bursting of a shell kills the girls brother, a drummer boy, but before he dies he picks up the forged dispatch and puts it in the pocket of his coat. Twenty years after the girl, still unmarried, gets this coat to wave out of the window as the veterans march by. The dispatch is found and the past is made clear. The disgraced captain is surprised to hear his old comrades calling for him to march at their head. And the picture closes with Jack and Bess decorating the grave of Dave, as the grizzled veterans are grouped in the background. It is a film that will deeply stir emotions and contains scenes that rouse the feeling of patriotism. No manager will make a mistake in booking this for Memorial Day.

"Branding a Bad Man" (American).—Here we have a roaring Western farce, showing cowboys at their play. It is a scream from beginning to end and tells the story of what happens when bad men when the boys get busy. This will make them laugh from beginning to end.

"His Second Choice" (Nestor).—This love story relates how a young man of wealth, infatuated by a belle, is sent by his parents to the country, and is captured by a country girl. The picture is made notable by the usual magical Nestorian photography, which always attracts with its excellence and individuality.

"The Lighthouse Keeper" (Imp).—Here is a film that makes the audience almost rise to its feet. It is a story of love and jealousy. The light has been tampered with and the little fishing smack bearing the hero and his wife is endeavoring to make a landing. The interest centers in the reproduction of the storm, which forms a thrilling spectacle, with the wild waves threatening to overwhelm the smack. The struggle at the foot of the stairs where the old light keeper overcomes the disappointed rival and the latter's fall down the long flight of stairs into the water are scenes which hold the interest of the audience. Then the light flashes out and the boat comes safely home, quite as much to the joy of the audience as the friends waiting on the shore.

"The Outlaw and the Female Detective" (Bison).—This picture has a new character, a lady detective who gets her bad man, is a very original, though far from convincing manner. When she turns him over to the authorities, the sheriff seems anxious to hang him up forthwith, but the lady points to her star. It is a smaller one than the sheriff's, but when she points out that it gives her authority, the sheriff admits it and lets the culprit have his chance before a jury. The detective in a very realistic way takes her prize money and goes about her business.

"The Stage Child" (Thanhouser).—In this picture little Maria Eline takes the part of the stage child. A baby is shown in the first scenes and the "Thanhouser Kid" impersonates this baby three years later. Spectators everywhere take a good deal of interest in Maria Eline and her acting, which is remarkably good. It is safe to say that this picture, which in itself is interesting, will be popular. It is not an important picture.

"Her Atonement" (Powers).—This picture reminds one of Leah Kle chner. It has the same underlying idea. Mrs. Fisk made the motivation of Leah vivid at least, though even she didn't make the drama very convincing. The young lady who plays the heroine in this picture seemed quite unable to represent effectively a woman coming from prison. In the scenes in her home with her father and his pal she does very well.

"The Voice of Conscience" (Great Northern).—Here is a strangely dramatic film presenting the effect of a disturbed conscience in a very convincing way. It is startling to see a man so diabolical that he will give a bomb to a child as a plaything. Following that comes the action of conscience. The idea is so strongly worked out that the audience almost feels with the man the working of that inner monitor which shows itself plainly in his countenance. The apparition of the child haunts him continuously until reason totters. The scene when he convinces himself when the child is brought to his cell that this is not a return of the apparition is intensely dramatic, and the change when he is convinced is very marked. The picture made a strong impression upon the audience. Indeed, the memory of it will remain long with those who see it. It is very well acted.

"Berne, Switzerland" (Great Northern).—This travelog presents a series of good pictures, some of the most attractive points in this beautiful city. The views are good and the photographer has done his work well.

"Bill at Work" (Lux).—A trick film representing Bill at work as a furniture remover, falling asleep and dreaming all sorts of queer things. Some of the performances of the chair upon which he is sitting are funny and all are interesting. A swift kick, properly placed, arouses Bill and he proceeds on his way.

"All Through a Rat" (Lux).—A comedy reproducing the difficulty caused by a tame rat in a cupboard. The panic is becoming dangerous when the children appear and take their pet away.

"The Banana Planter's Peril" (Yankee).—Here is excitement enough for one film. The scene is laid on a banana plantation and the opening is interesting, reproducing a large plantation with the natives at work. An overseer discharged for abusing a girl incites the natives to riot and wreck the planter's house. This scene is very good. The scene where the wounded girl is dragging herself painfully to where the planter lies in his hammock to tell him of the plot, made the audience almost hold its breath. The defense was a good fight, while the closing scene, with the padre blessing the planter and the girl, is a fitting and impressive close for a film which is more than ordinarily exciting.

"The Waistcoat With Points (Eclair).—The waistcoat is made of light pieces of metal and the points are sharp arrow tips that pass through the coat. Anyone who slaps a man wearing such a waistcoat gets into trouble. Casimir is "henpecked" and this is the way he gets even. His progress home with the new waistcoat and a good jag is what keeps the audience giggling continuously.

"A Mother's Distress" (Eclair).—This is an episode with a psychological interest. Its feature is the doctor's method of awakening to her senses a woman driven insane by seeing her child in danger of being run over by a tram. The doctor makes her think that the child is again in danger, and she in her distress knows her child is again and is cured.

"The Little Western Rose" (Yankee).—This picture has one very good scene—the chase of the bad men and the "greaser." There is a little white pony in this scene that is fast and he comes through the picture just right. The other scenes in the picture are lacking in artistic quality, and the reason seems to be largely due to lack of foreground and the nearness of the camera. Quickly moving horses and men under such circumstances are unpleasant.

We have been informed by Mr. Thomas Phillips, proprietor of the Genre Motion Slide Company and one of the pioneer song slide manufacturers of the city, that a convention of song-slide manufacturers will be held at Boston, Mass., during the month of August. The object of the convention will be to discuss and plan for the future of this very valuable adjunct of the moving picture enterprise.

WESTERN FEATURES BY THE AMERICAN FILM MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

The American Film Mfg. Co. are releasing a number of Western subjects for the coming week. We were invited over to the factory to a private exhibition and were gratified to notice the earnest endeavors of this firm to maintain and if possible improve the high quality of the "Flying A."

Among the pictures shown, we were most impressed by "A Sheepman's Daughter" and "The Witch of the Ranch"—two Western productions of strong dramatic action and superb "American" photography.

"The Sheepman's Daughter" is the tale of the feud of old between sheepmen and cattlemen and the romance of a fighting parson and the girl.

"The Witch of the Ranch" is a weird story of a man's superstition and fanatic brutality, and the appealing reward of an old woman in gratitude of a shown kindness.

Two good stories, well told.

ATTRACTIVE INSIDE AND OUT.

The lobby is the show window of the theater and the majority of the public judge the inside of the house and even the program by the appearance of the entrance. Attractive lobby displays of moving picture stock companies and framed illustrations from the program of the week is one of the best ways to make a favorable impression. The booklet issued by the Newman Mfg. Co., of Cincinnati, O., shows a number of illustrations of handsome brass easels and brass poster and photo frames, designed especially for moving picture theaters and in a great variety of styles. They also are large manufacturers of brass rails for ticket entrances, piano and orchestra pits, boxes and balconies and a well kept brass rail is hard to beat for style and appearance in any house.

They have supplied a large number of theaters throughout the country and have received many testimonials as to the drawing power of the neat and excellent lobby displays made possible with their outfits. A few dollars expended in this direction will undoubtedly return with interest in additional patronage.

We learn from the Philadelphia "North American" that Charles A. Caleluff has brought suit against the General Film Company to enforce immediate payment of the purchase price of his exchange.

The Ortho Film Company, of Chicago, has moved its headquarters to 208 Market Street, Pittsburg, Pa. They have reorganized, and increased their capital stock to $50,000 for the purpose of manufacturing high grade educational, advertising, topical, scenic, historical moving pictures and everything pertaining to same.

They have erected laboratories for the purpose of finishing, printing and developing for the trade by their new Hochstetter process.

The Vitagraph Company have under course of construction and production the "Leather Stocking Tales" by Fenimore Cooper, including "The Pathfinder," "The Deer Slayer" and "The Last of the Mohicans." This series of pictures will undoubtedly create as great, if not greater, interest than "A Tale of Two Cities." They will be replete with the most careful portrayal of the scenes, dress and characteristics of the early periods of American history and Indian life, introducing the hair-breadth escapes, encounters and incidents of real adventure, giving a good panoramic resume insight into the character of the aborigines of this country and showing the encroachments of the white man upon their rights of territory and precedence.

An up-to-date Brooklyn exhibitor who ever seeks the comfort of his patrons by special care, has installed "Great Bear" water bottles for free use of the people on especial occasions, comparable to cut-rate ice. This is done without any advertising, and not as an attraction, but simply as a matter of thoughtfulness, which is appreciated by guests who do not abuse such kindnesses.

IF there is a laugh left in you it will come out when you see the funnies in "The Monogram J. O." a film that don't need an X-ray to find the comedy. It's a REX, of course.

LOVE PROVES STRONGER THAN DUTY—A [illegible] was [illegible] a job, sees [illegible] and [illegible] money with [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Eleanor's chum, Edith Denton, shows to Eleanor a magazine containing a portrait of Smith and an account of his tramp adventures.

The happy couple have just been married when the bride's father is the receiver of a message from Arnold telling him that Smith, the bridegroom, is a worthless tramp. Consternation follows which is quelled by Eleanor who produces the portrait as proof of her husband's identity.

ONE OF NATURE'S NOBLEMEN.—A country dance is interrupted by two cowboys who dash in fighting. A girl is the cause, and she rushes between them to break up the hostilities. They are then hurried out by the boys, who endeavor to effect a reconciliation, but they fail and Clay goes away.

A month later the girl and Clay are married. Four years elapse and we are introduced to Clay's little girl. They live in an isolated place, and Clay has gone to the settlement for supplies. The baby watches her father until he is out of sight, then wanders on alone in search of him. Even the four years have not served to gentle Clay and his old-time rival friends, and this meeting as they meet upon the trail, Clay, as usual, refuses to speak.

Riding along, Clay runs into a band of Apaches, and he beats a hasty retreat, followed by the Indians. He overtakes John, and warns him of their danger. A stray shot hits Clay, causing him to fall from his horse unnoticed by John who, when he discovers the riderless horse beside him, rushes back to rescue Clay. And he is not a second too soon, for the Indians are fording the river. They circle around the white men, but the lucky aim of John gets one of them, and they hesitate to tempt fate against such sure aim. Assisting Clay to mount, John leads the horse.

Of course, the mother has missed the baby and is distracted. The little thing has been discovered and carried away by the Indians, and when Clay is brought home badly wounded, it adds to the terror of the mother, who tells them of the lost child. John immediately goes forth in search and sees the Indians with her. He hides his horse behind a rock and creeps nearer to watch the Indians, who have now stopped.

His vigil is rewarded, for leaving but four of their party to guard the child and wounded man, the rest sally forth to make another raid. Feeling perfectly safe, the guards become careless, allowing the child freedom. The opportunity arrives, for the one who goes for the child is shot by the waiting John, and the wonderful aim gets the remaining three. Then grabbing the child he reaches his horse unmolested.

Arriving at the Clay abode he restores the baby to its mother and father, the barrier between the two men breaks and they become friends.

THE ROSE OF OLD ST. AUGUSTINE.—Captain Lafitte receives word that Alicante, a young Spaniard, is to wed Dolores, the Rose of St. Augustine, whom he has not seen since childhood. He objects to the wedding. Lafitte captures Alicante, dresses in his clothes, and with Dalrey, his lieutenant, dressed as his valet, and Black Hawk, a Seminole Indian of his band, go to St. Augustine and pose as Alicante. Dolores falls in love with him as Alicante. Dalrey falls madly in love with her, is refused and betrays Lafitte to her father, a commandant. Lafitte is made prisoner and while Dalrey lauds her father and soldiers to capture the band of the Privateers, Black Hawk and others rescue Lafitte from the dungeon. Black Hawk kills the jailer and they escape. The Privateers are attacked by Dalrey and Spanish soldiers and after a fight the most of them escape by boats to their schooner, which is at anchor off the shore.

Alicante is rescued and news is brought of the escape of Lafitte and Dolores by a soldier sent by the Dandie. The fugitives are followed by the commandant and soldiers, who use a bloodhound to track them. They are fired on as they float down the bay on an improvised raft—are rescued by the Privateers and taken aboard the ship. Lafitte determines to capture Dolores—the attacking party is ambushed on the shell road. All are rounded up except the traitor, and return to the vessel. The shocking incident is of a very sensational nature. Dalrey being forced to walk the plank—the reward of treachery.

MELIES.

IN TIME FOR PRESS.—Edith Gates, whose father owns the X. Y. ranch, has a burning desire to become a newspaper woman, but it is very difficult to accomplish as she imagines. She is turned down by the editor and another and finally succeeds in the office of the "Blade" by Jim Ford, who is the star assignment man. Jack Burton, a rival reporter, comes to Edith's assistance and is discharged for his gallantry.

Edith returns to her home, and Jack secures employment on the "Express," the rival paper of the "Blade," where he "makes good." A month later the "Limited" is held up and the bandits escape. It looks like a good story and Jack is dispatched to the spot, while Ford is sent to the "Blade."

The rival reporters meet at the sheriff's office and join the posse, and the bandits and their booty are finally captured.

Now that the story is in, each reporter hastens to the nearest wire to send the news to his paper, and there is a race between them. When he sees that Jack's house is the better, and he is losing the fastest, Ford does a cowardly trick. He falls from his horse and pretends to be injured. Jack rushes back to the aid of his enemy, only to be knocked down for his pains, and is trampled on by Ford's horse.

Ford drives Jack's horse away and rides for the telegraph office, while Jack staggers to the nearest ranch. He is surprised to meet Edith there, and when the plucky little woman learns the particulars, she is anxious to outwit the man who has insulted her and offers to ride with the story to the nearest wire. In the race that ensues she wins, and gets her story into the office of the "Express" just as that ink-spattered martinet, the pressman, declares finally that the paper is "going to bed" even if all the robbers in Texas are captured.

Needless to say, while Jack recuperates from his injuries, a romance matures which finally finds its way into print via the "Wedding Column."

KALEM.

BERTIE'S REFORMATION.—Bertie is a victim of the White Lights. His father persuades Jessie to join the chorus in order to win Bertie away from Broadway. Jessie gets a job and takes a room in the same boarding house where Bertie is living. Bertie meets Jessie at the stage door and makes an hasten bit. Bertie retires to the stage entrance and makes a date with the new chorus girl, eventually bounding much smitten with her charms. The result is that Bertie and Jessie are entranced and broke. Papa arrives in time to see Bertie's predicament and plans to conquer the job by having his landlady eject him from the house. Bertie calls on Jessie, is coldly received, gets the mitten and decides to go back home. Papa arrives at Bertie's house, he finds a surprise awaiting him and swears he must Broadway for him.

Bertie goes back home to say Ned leaves home to begin life's struggle. One year of the latter proves the boy worthless and he drifts into Cullen Camp. The former arouses even the presence of the boy young leader and make it uncomfortable for him. He, however, writes to his mother. I am making a great success out here. The boys like me so much they propose making me Mayor of the town. Mrs. Bertie, believing his letter true, she decides to visit him. Dick meets Mrs. Bertie on the train when returning to camp from a business trip. In the meantime the tutors decide to rid the camp of Ned. The mother, how ever, arrives in camp just as they are driving him out. Dick, who has learned of Ned's letter to his mother tells the boys about it and they agree to carry out Ned's deception for his mother's sake. That night Ned attempts flight and talks into a deserted tunnel shaft. Respecting the mother's sacred grief the boys decide to continue the deception and she leaves the camp believing her son died at the height of his success and popularity.

LUBIN.

A GAME OF DECEPTION.—John Howe a rich miner's son, was supposed to be studying hard in New York to enter the ministry. In reality he was wasting his life in fashionable resorts. Finding that he might be studying too hard asked him to return home and send him a check for $1,000 to go to Europe. In fulfilling his humorous vision. Thereupon he father denounced him, sending a curse and stopping a check.

John scanned the few letters that he received to be sure a message came instead of a reminder, and when he did not find one he sent a cable to Fanny Lane, a New York chorus girl.

When John found that Fanny Lane, the family hastily put away every trace of dissipation and set out with their daughter staged about the remainder a gala reception. Fanny Lane, who had received a cable, the actress to whom the minister's son was engaged, arrived. She had not been long in the house when a visit. There was a scene of consternation and strange scenes and disturbances in the Lane house after that.

The actress disgusted herself as an adult but John soon thought of deception and after a great deal of fun he and Dudley were happily reunited.

THE FEUD.—Harry Harriel found the photograph of a beautiful girl, and promptly fell in love with the original. Then he learned that she was Edith Green, daughter of Mary Green, he owned Mary Green and Virginia Harriel. Harry's father there was a bitter feud. They owned adjoining ranches and whenever they met their forces met there was a grand melee and considerable shooting. It was also well known that cows her choice. Hugh being younger and dressier, so he gave his consent. When the young man returned to her with the news, Edith promptly rejected him. Then she ran to the professor, who was decidedly gloomy, and told him that she loved only him.

EDISON.

THE CARDINAL'S EDICT.—Adrian De Maupret, a gallant soldier of fortune, meets and falls desperately in love with the Cardinal's ward, Julie, who in turn shows that his attentions are not unwelcome.

Owing to the numerous duels being fought in Paris, the Cardinal is obliged to issue an edict forbidding dueling and making death the penalty if the edict is disregarded.

De Maupret enters a tavern and engages in a dice game with a stranger and soon learns that the stranger is a sharp and catches him cheating. He throws his wine into the cheat's face and in a moment both rapiers are drawn. In spite of the interference of friends they fight their duel and De Maupret runs his man through. No sooner has this happened than the Cardinal appears with his guard and places De Maupret under arrest.

The Cardinal is pondering whether to enforce the penalty of the edict when his ward, having seen De Maupret under arrest, demands an explanation. When told that his life is forfeited she betrays and finally confesses her love for De Maupret. Richelieu, however, remains firm and sends her away without much encouragement.

His secretary then announces the arrival of his spy, Marion De Lorme, who, upon being admitted through a secret panel, informs him of a conspiracy headed by the King's own brother, which is to be culminated that night at her house and that she needs a brave man to secure a certain dispatch which they will send and which will contain absolute proof of their guilt.

Richelieu is reminded of his prisoner and decides to give him a chance to redeem himself. He is called in and given his choice, death or obtaining the dispatch. He chooses the task of obtaining the dispatch, especially as he catches a glimpse of Julie, who has stolen into the room and who encourages him from her hiding place behind the curtains.

He enters Marion's house as a servant and as the messenger with the dispatch is about to mount, he overpowers him, wrests the dispatch from his grasp, mounts the horse and rides away to the Cardinal's palace, but not, however, before being badly hurt by a bullet which the unfortunate messenger sent flying after him.

Upon receiving the dispatch the Cardinal not only pardons his violation of the edict but gives him the hand of his ward, Julie as a reward.

A LESSON LEARNED.—John Lacey, a night watchman, is slowly succumbing to the drink habit. His wife sees this and tries her best to keep him from it, but without avail. She has already seen one life wrecked through drink; her brother turned drunkard and though innocent of crime, sent to prison for a long term. Her husband is not aware of this brother's existence and she very carefully conceals a letter which she receives from him.

Lacey, having taken a number of drinks, starts to work. He has already left when the convict brother, who has escaped from prison, enters the house and begs his sister to conceal him. While meditating where she can conceal him, she hears her husband returning and has barely time to secrete him behind the curtains when her husband enters. He has returned for his revolver and accidentally, more whiskey. His wife remonstrates with him but to no advantage. He becomes angry at her insistance, and losing his temper, is about to strike her when her brother knocks him down. Seeing the prisoner stripped on his assailant he covers him with his revolver and calls up the police. The wife, recovering, hears this and confesses that the man is her brother and holds him up as a horrible example of the result of drink.

The husband, now thoroughly ashamed, and realizing what a brute drink has made of him, solemnly swears never to drink again. They then plan to get her brother away from the officers. He gives him some clothes and money, but just as he is about to leave they hear the police approaching. Lacey tells his wife to lead him back into the bedroom, then, telling his wife to steam fanning, he wrecks the furniture, chairs, table, lights and curtains are all upset or demolished. As the officers are about to enter he deliberately shoots himself in the arm and hurriedly explains to them that the prisoner attacked him and escaped and they hurry on. When safely out of reach the brother is allowed to make his escape.

FATHER'S DRESS SUIT.—A high school youth is invited by his little sweetheart to go to her party. He accepts the invitation and intends to attend. It is the height of his ambition to dress for the occasion, as he anticipates the calling, the supper and more pleasing to his sweetheart.

Not possessing a dress suit, he borrows his father's but without permission. By chance his mother is let into the secret and joyfully he goes to the party. That evening, his father, wishing to don his dress suit, is unable to find it. By interrogating mother he learns of its whereabouts and immediately starts out to fetch the boy home.

By this time the party is in full swing, our hero having become the idol of the girls and the envy of the boys to such an extent that they play all sorts of boyish tricks on him; tripping him while dancing, spilling red lemonade on his white shirt front and so forth. At the height of his dilemma, father unexpectedly appears and leads him out by the ear to the gratification of the boys and disappointment of the girls.

VITAGRAPH.

CUPID'S CHAUFFEUR.—Papa Boggs decides to send Caroline back to boarding school, taking her there himself in his automobile. Harry hears of this and with the aid of friends arranges a plot to outdo the old gentleman. They induce his chauffeur to allow Harry to disguise himself in the chauffeur's livery for coal, cap and goggles and run the machine that is to carry Caroline and her father to the boarding school. The friends disguise themselves as bold highwaymen to waylay Mr. Boggs, and hold up his limousine as it passes through a lonely patch of wood, which they have selected as a point of advantage to do the trick. While they are robbing the old gentleman, Harry, as the chauffeur, runs away, leaving the old gentleman and his daughter at the mercy of the thieves, who take him further into the woods to strip him of his valuables. In the meantime Harry throws off the disguise of the chauffeur and picks up his gun and hunting outfit, placed at a convenient point, and saunters towards the spot where old man Boggs is being relieved of his belongings, just in time to get the drop on the three highwaymen and make their flight impossible. He soon make them give back the things that they have stolen and puts them to flight. Mr. Boggs' gratitude is unspeakable, as he grasps the hand of Harry Branscombe. But after he has recovered from his fright and surprise he turns to Caroline, who has followed her father, takes her hand and places it in that of his deliverer and bestows his blessing upon his daughter and his future son-in-law.

THE ENDS OF THE EARTH.—Suffering from indifference, the wife does not appreciate the love bestowed upon her by her husband. Her husband, disconcerted, leaves for the far away North. Six months later he finds himself in the uncivilized regions of the snow-covered mountain trails of the great North country. In the meantime, his wife has had time to repent her indifference and now that she is to become a mother, longs for her husband's society. She decides to search for him.

While she is traveling on dog sleds, bearing the child to her breast, he is plunging deeper and deeper into the wilds of the forests. In making his way down a deep ravine he loses his footing and falls heavily to the bottom, breaking his leg.

Glad in heavy furs, his wife, with her little boy in her carried on the dog sled, reaches the fateful guide "Caribou Bill" arrives at the trappers' hut where word of her husband having passed that way a few hours before. The tough but tender-hearted man induce her to leave her baby with them, if she must go in further search of her husband. She kisses the baby good-bye and continues on her way, encountering the dangers of the approaching night, until she reaches the snow tracks, which inspire her with renewed hope and vigor. The dogs scent the foot prints and it is not long before they reach the injured man. Just in time to carry him safely back to camp, where he is revived and when sufficiently restored to health, is presented with his little son, whom he tenderly clasps to his breast and affectionately embraces his wife, who by her self-sacrifice proves his love would not be worth living and she will continue to follow him even to "The ends of the earth."

A CLEVER FRAUD.—Harry, who is attending college, has fallen in love with a young actress, Nellie. His chum, Jack, warns him that she objects to his paying attention to a stage girl and positively threatens to disinherit him if he insists upon marrying her. In order to accomplish a union, she invites a young lady to visit his sister and then writes Harry to come home at once to meet this young lady as her choice for his future wife.

Upon receipt of the letter, Harry is very much disheartened; he shows it to Nellie; she replies the matter very seriously, which adds to his discomfiture. Nellie, made a great success in impersonating lions on the stage, determines to masquerade as a college chum of Harry's and attend the reception which Aunt Cecile has arranged for her chosen niece.

While Harry is deploring and meditating over the state of affairs Nellie visits him and succeeds in completely made until, surprises Harry by entering into his room and it is some time before he recognizes her. She makes known the object and persuades him to agree to take her with him to his Aunt Cecile's.

Everything works like a charm, up only the young lady whom Harry is to meet fails to keep with Nellie on Aunt Cecile's arrival she finds with her delightful company. The rest of the hours at the reception are very tedious of Harry's college chum and plan to have him after everybody has retired for the night. Nellie overhears the plan, is frightened to death and seeks protection in the girls room, where she issues great excitement. Which is quieted when Nellie makes known her identity, much to the chagrin of the "chums one" and the rest of the girls, all of whom have become trying to make love to Nellie, whom they thought to be a boy. The girls appreciate the joke to the boys as well as on themselves and help Nellie carry it a little further, taking her boy suit, making a dummy of it and placing it in the bed which Nellie was to occupy.

The boys sneak into Nellie's room, prepared to give the "young beau" a regular "rough house." They attack the dummy and discover the trick which has been played upon them. When Edgar is a still greater surprise to them and to Aunt Cecil when they find out that the young gallant who so completely won the hearts of the girls is no less a person than Harry's across sweetheart. Aunt Cecil not only acknowledges her devotion, but she confesses that she is no less pleasing and attractive as a girl than she was as a boy, quite deserving of Harry's love and her blessing.

Released TUESDAY and SATURDAY

Last week we took up the "Just good enough" idea as applied to military pictures. We said, among other things, that one good battle scene wouldn't make such a picture good. A scene, after all, is an incident, and no matter how strong, will not carry the entire story unless the other incidents in it have some value. This applies to not only military films but films generally.

Take Indian films. Can a war dance or a chase, done to perfection, make a film of this nature a winner? They can, when the other incidents in the story are worth while. And only then. The film maker who produces a spectacular effect for an Indian picture and lets it go at that, is actually imperiling the standing of his product. He doesn't feel that way about it when he hears the spectacular scene meet with applause at almost any theater he steps into. He feels that the Public is with him in his efforts, and he says, rightly, that the Public is whom Manufacturer, Exhibitor and Exchangeman look to for a living.

BUT THE PUBLIC ISN'T WITH HIM. The loud plaudits of the few who like spectacular scenes and no story, fooled him, just as the comedian who told the vulgar stories at the vaudeville show deceived himself into thinking he was best on the bill because he got the most guffaws. The film maker deceives himself when he takes the reception of a spectacular effect as a criterion.

The fact of the matter is, that the main portion of the public goes to your show to see stories, or stories and spectacular, but never spectacles alone. If you were in this business in its early days you know that everything you ran was some kind of a spectacle. "Passing of the Lightning Express" was a spectacle; "Arrival of French Troops at Brest" was a spectacle. So was "John Rice Kissing May Irwin," "Dead Man's Curve" and the rest of the first crop. But you know from your own experience that the only place you could exhibit pictures at a profit was at a few amusement resorts. Spectacles didn't draw many people.

But the creation of the story solved your problem. Everyone is interested in stories, and picture screens are now telling them daily in almost every hamlet and way station. THAT'S WHY THE STORY IS THE LETTER A OF THE POWERS ALPHABET. We give you spectacular effects as often as the next man, BUT WE GIVE GOOD STORIES ALL THE TIME.

Has your exchange your application for "The King of Kazam," with Nat M. Wills in the leading role?

led the unfortunate woman, bound her to a tree, and were piling brush around her, when they heard the cowboys coming, and ran for their lives. The cowboys merely found Swift Wind with his knife raised above the unconscious Mary—for the poor Indian was trying to cut the ropes—and at once hustled the dying brave off to be strung up. Fortunately, ere the noose could be tightened, Mary revived sufficiently to explain the situation to them, and Swift Wind's last moments were filled with happiness.

A SURE CURE.—His daughter Dora, so Major Breeze irritably declared, seemed to divide her thoughts between the young doctor, Jack Wells, and the latest novelty, the latter a decided improvement, but the former he had sternly forbidden his house. She felt almost like drinking some of her deadly poisonous solution of chloroform when the girl told him, but disrespectful Dr. Wells suggested that she give it to the major instead.

This flippant remark gave Dora an idea. The solution of chromic acid was about the color of her father's whiskey; they could easily procure acid label on his bottle, trusting to his near-sightedness not to observe it, then after he had taken a good big drink, Dora would come to the rescue and make him think he was poisoned.

Jack's fellow colleagues in the vicinity, were to be let into the secret, and when called, tell the poor major that his case was utterly hopeless; it would then be Dr. Wells's cue to appear seemingly cure the old gentleman, and as a reward receive his happy daughter.

The whole scheme worked like a charm; the young people, however, had no sooner received the major's blessing, than they hurried him off to the Rev. Doctor Brodie, taking no chances, should the old gentleman learn of their deception.

THE GRIND.—David Collins enters a university to prepare for the struggle with the world. He is spotted the instant he appears on the campus and the students decide to make life miserable for the new arrival.

He is attacked and subjected to all sorts of insults. David endures the sneers of his room and tries to study, but the din in the room below is terrible and he decides to put a stop to it. Gaining an entrance to the room in which the students are enjoying themselves in a hilarious way he is once more insulted, the scene ending in his being thrown down stairs. He goes to his room again and his life is made miserable.

David concludes to turn the tables on his tormentors, and seeks the services of an instructor in boxing. After the final lesson his tormentors are lying in a heap for him. To their consternation David calls in, and "cleans up the bunch."

THE CHICAGO STOCKYARDS FIRE.—One of the most disastrous fires in the history of Chicago was the recent conflagration in the stockyards district in which over 500 people were rendered homeless and many lost their lives by the seething cauldron of flames, which stubbornly resisted the efforts of the fire department. It occurred in "Whiskey Point," a ramshackle tenement district in the outskirts of the Union Stockyards, the largest in the world.

There is the spectacular work of the firemen, the falling walls, the dames shooting hundreds of feet in the air, illuminating the sky for many miles. There are scenes of horror, depicting the grief of the poor victims, being rendered homeless by the devouring element, the hasty removing of household effects from the tumble down dwellings and the miraculous escapes from danger of those fleeing from the flames in the path of the fire fiend.

BACK TO THE SOIL.—George Dupont, a young farmer, is living with his parents on the farm, while his sweetheart, Sadie Gilbert, resides in the adjoining farm. George finds rural life irksome and is satisfied that he has talent as an artist. He goes to Paris and school in the city, leaving the rest of fabulous sums received for paintings. He resolves to quit the farm for a career, despite the protests of his father, but his mother, wrapped up in her son, gives him money she has saved by years of economy and he goes to the city to gratify his ambition. He departs, bidding adieu to his parents and sweetheart.

He enters a school of art. The professor encourages him, having an eye to the main chance as the student has money, but the pupils laugh at his efforts and he is the butt of their jokes. He writes home, giving glowing accounts of his progress and the mother and sweetheart are happy, but he is skeptical.

A year passes and his money is exhausted, so the instructor tells him he has no talent and dismisses him from the school. George tries to write home of his failure, but his nerve fails him. Meanwhile those at home have been waiting in vain for a letter, so Sadie resolves to go to the city and look him up.

She takes lodgings in the same house with him in an adjoining room and pays the rent of his room without his knowledge. George offers the landlady one of his paintings to satisfy her, but she indignantly refuses it. His sweetheart buys the painting from the landlady, inducing her to take it and thus aiding him without his knowledge, the landlady refusing to divulge the name of the buyer.

George decides to return to the farm, and packs his belongings, his sweetheart listening on the other side of the wall satisfied with her mission. Sad, Sadie returns home without his knowing that she was near him.

Arriving at home, George finds Sadie there and they connect a little joke on his parents. Finding a pair of boots in the barn, he dons them and goes into the field to plow. Sadie calls out the father and mother and points to the field, and the old man gets his dinner bell and rings it, summoning the lady to dinner.

The father and mother and Sadie and the farm hands seat themselves at table. George enters the dining-room without attracting attention and then gives way to his grief, breaking down entirely when there is a general awakening. His plate is heaped with food and the prodigal is welcomed home with warmth, satisfied with the farm and its environments and above all with his faithful sweetheart.

AMERICAN.

THE SHEEPMAN'S DAUGHTER.—Richard Mead was a sheepherder who lived with his daughter in a hut in the mountains. He was opposed by the cattlemen and was ordered to quit the range. Returning to his home he tells his daughter what has happened, and prepares to protect himself. The cattleman orders two men to go to his hut and put him out of the way.

In the battle that follows the sheepman is wounded and one of the cowboys killed. The surviving one returns to town for assistance and the sheepman secrets himself in the mountains. On the arrival of the posse they find the sheepman gone and the daughter alone in the hut. The posse arrives in town to be scorned by the women and jeered by the men.

The posse again bears the insulting remarks and befriends her, offering her a home with his mother. In the meantime a cowboy has discovered the hiding-place of the girl's father and returns to inform the posse and is overheard by the minister, who determines to reach the fugitive first if he can get there before him.

The daughter pleads to be taken along and the boy and girl ride away, the minister arriving at his refuge in the mountains. Shortly after the posse ride in and demand the immediate surrender of the sheepman. The minister knows that he is cornered down and, at the point of the gun he has taken from the prostrated cattleman, preaches his first sermon, the posse soon realizing that they are fooled again.

The posse return guiltless of the sheepman's blood and the minister has settled a desperate feud, filled his church, and gained a wife.

THE SAGE-BRUSH PHRENOLOGIST.—The arrival of Professor Bumpus at the Flubdash ranch, is hailed with delight and the members of the family have their bumps examined by the learned man. He discovers that a bump of punching cows like ranchman should have been a great orator, but as a great orator he is not a great musician, and his daughter a great singer.

Highly elated they all practise in private what they believe to be their destiny and result in some extremely comical situations. When they finally get together each tries to outdo the other to the great amusement of the ranch hands. It finally dawns upon them how extremely ridiculous it is and they start out to find the professor and some "bumps" he will remember. They come upon him on the trail where he is resting by the roadside and have a comical encounter.

The unhappy family, in trying to discover who is to blame for allowing the professor to examine their bumps, are in a state of mutual recrimination in the turmoil the professor escapes and, seeking a secluded spot, he examines his bumps.

THE SPELLBINDER OF DOUBLE L RANCH.—The Widow Walker and her daughter Molly become neighbors of the ranchmen and one day while Molly is riding she is thrown from her horse and she calls the foreman who is passing to assist her. Reluctantly he comes forward to help her and she speedily overcomes his objections to the society of ladies.

He is so smitten her mother has started out to make a friendly call at the "Double L Ranch" and finding Jim Farren at home and gone, matters progress rapidly for Jim and Molly, since he come enamored of mother and daughter respectively, and in order to conceal their intentions from each other plan an elopement with the lady of their choice.

The elopements are planned for the same day and the two ladies, in their excitement, become ultrasonally of course explanations are in order and both men become friendless regardless of their vow.

$5,000 REWARD. DEAD OR ALIVE.—Steve Carter is being compared on the Bar X Ranch, based Mexico, and is wanted at Chief Gap for the sheriff and she was not indifferent to the ranch cowboy.

Meanwhile, they had a pastime in the mountains among the rocks and mines if the codes were exchanged between the bosses and the miners, the miners scattered a pair of loaded dice, which had been fabricated the miners, and the cattlemen after a conference, decided to send a reward for the capture, dead or a live, of the mysterious bandits.

The notices were posted by the sheriff, but the depredations of the bandits continued, and one morning a ranchman, going home with a large amount of money—the payroll for his employees, was held up the outlaw by one of the pair. The bandit escaped into the shelter of the mountain and by a strange coincidence cached the bag of gold in the barrel of the pistol.

Shortly after Steve Frazer rode up to get his accustomed mail and found instead the bag of gold, leaving the note and taking the gold, he hurries to the sheriff's home to report his discovery. A posse is formed and they start immediately for the scene of the robbery.

In the meantime the bandit who committed the daring crime had arrived at confidence with minute instructions, to procure the gold cached in the lover's pistol. He finds the place, but instead of the desired gold he finds a note.

"If you love me as I love you.

"So knife can cut our love in two."

Believing that his partner has played him, he returns to the rendezvous and accuses him of double-crossing him. This is denied emphatically, and together they retire to the rock, but find only the note. Both are now thoroughly angry, and accusations against each other are fast and furious. "When thieves fall out honest men get their dues" and forgetting where they are, start to fight. They are close enough when the posse comes upon them and they are easily captured. The reward offered for their capture goes to Steve Frazer and he in turn is pleased to claim the fair Alamas Madie Howard, and the culmination is a happy one.

ECLAIR.

IMPUDENCE PUNISHED.—A "bachelor" party is a breakfast and the talk turning to ladies one makes a boast that he can capture the affections of a certain married lady, unaware that friend of her husband is among the party. This gentleman goes to the hotel where the lady and her husband are staying and informs them of the affair. The boaster has made a wager to the above effect. When the would-be Don Juan calls, the husband tells the lady to comply with his wife, and the latter appears to accept his approaches, and agrees to meet him in the garden at ten at night. The boaster tells his friends of his exploit planned, unaware that a washerwoman has been induced to take the place of the lady. Meeting her he makes passionate protestations to the veiled figure, and embraces it, to be rudely hugged by the washerwoman, who exclaims that she is glad to at last get some go with all the friends have witnessed his discomfiture.

TOMMY AT THE DENTIST'S.—Tommy wakes with a violent toothache and decides there is only one cure for it—a visit to the dentist's. Directly the door opens and he sees the dentist's wife and Tommy wants to run away, but the latter is said to patients of this sort, and seeing Tommy, drags him into the room and forcibly sits him down in the chair but all his efforts are vain, the tooth will not come out. He is obliged to enlist the assistance of all the servants in the house, but to no purpose, but to no purpose. He goes relief at last suddenly he pretending to faint, and rushes out in the street, who gives him a blow on the jaw which releases the tooth, and to the man's utter astonishment he is warmly thanked by his victim.

YANKEE.

MRS. BIFFINS' DEMISE.—Willie Jones, a prosperous young book agent, calls on Mr. Biffins at his office and endeavors to sell him a set of books. Biffins despises book agents, and drives Willie in a hasty manner. Willie is destined to come into the life of Biffins again, however, as a result of which he is the quiet Quaker homebody.

While making a canvass in the residential district meets a pretty little Quakeress who is none other than Biffins' wife. Willie finds that he is selling subscription on the installment plan. The Quakeress is quite dignified. Quakeress does not object to her husband having the books. One of the reasons becomes collecting the payments Will is a frequent caller.

Biffins is in the dark for a while, but one day he comes upon the pairs kissing and cooing and what Biffins says when he sees it. Will thanks the bereft of such gay badinage but Willie you means business. Quakeress, besides his wrangling was which has been the cause of Biffins' trouble book agents but now a necessity in love.

The outlook for Mrs. Willie besides it is less dangerous a first love and she speaks with Biffins to sanction the union of hearts, but nothing doing in that line for Biffins. No book agent and ever comes his life. Now Biffins is a straightforward man, and he cannot consent to the union of his wife to take of drink of water. Biffins unbeknown to the good wife, Biffins takes a little preparation for the purpose, and he falls dead from his loving arms in places the house. Jones and members his family out to touch it. This is for evidence in the case. Biffins is supposed to expire on a spread-out sheet.

After a decent lapse with his weeping daughter and wife suggests the marriage of the book agent and the girl, he goes to his office. Mrs. Biffins is self alone in sorrow. She realizes that her life is not worth while, and makes up her mind to die. She orders a wreath from the florist dons her old wedding dress and taking Biffins

THANHOUSER.

THE STEPMOTHER.—When the two little daughters of a young widower are told that he is planning to take up to the home to see them, a woman whom he has met at a summer resort, they are at once plunged into the depths of despair. Then feel that their home will be no longer tolerable if they are to have a stepmother, so that can always to go out in the world to earn their own living.

Their future is very much worried as well as contingent at their departure. He sets the police on the watch and finally locates them. He is determined to bring them home, and teach them once for all that he is master in his own house. A young lawyer who has been their friend summer, who is a practical business woman and a diplomat, marks her appearance. She persuades the father to allow her to win the girls over in her own way. This she does by taking a room in the home over lodging house to which the girls have fled. Here she introduces herself to them as the lodger across the hall, and the girls, in a short time, begin to confide their troubles entirely on her judgment. She arranges with them to leave their lodging house, and then reassures them that she knows he would not marry if they did not desire it. The girls go back to their home. Subsequent events tell a story of growing accounts of their charming new friend, from whom they extend a promise that she will come to see them often. Then they decide that they would be much happier is she were there all the time so that they can be assured that their father wants "their lady" unless he wishes to incur the everlasting displeasure of his daughters. Father, daughters, wedding, fiance, consents, and all family discord is at an end.

MOTORING.—A young millionaire, whose hobby is mechanics, takes his newly overhauled car out for a spin. He soon finds he has overlooked somebody told him that it was to be the most powerful car of his life. He finds the speed was no least free, but impressionable, and when he saw a pretty young woman in the road, asking him to help her in a stalled motor car, he was done so even and his time been really important.

The young woman, with her aunt, was taking an early morning spin, and ran out of gasoline with the engine. Her chauffeur was able to stop the car, but he could not start it again. All he could do was to poke the works of the machine with a chisel and remark that something seemed to be radically wrong.

The millionaire rendered first aid to the injured auto by producing a long rope, and towing it to a nearby garage. There he had time to investigate, and not being a professional chauffeur, he was able to get things right in a jiffy.

The regular chauffeur was much grieved, and his sorrow increased when the aunt came out and chatted with him regarding his discomfiture. In a rage the chauffeur quit his job on the spot, leaving his passengers stranded far from home.

When it grew natural then that the aunt should ask the young man to run her car? He looked like a millionaire, and was good for a tip of four. He didn't want the job, of course, but he did want to see more of the pretty girl. And like the fine chap he was he made the choice. He thought the well born, well to do girl, a ladies' maid.

The girl induced her aunt to let her carry on the deception. "Just for a lark," and the maid and the chauffeur enjoyed the trip immensely. She learned how to run an automobile and he learned that the most unfortunate men in the world were the blind ones who could not see the beautiful girl he gazed at so fondly. It was natural that he should ask the privilege of calling upon her, and it was natural that she should refuse, as the joke had gone far enough. But she accidentally forgot to tell him she chauffeur really was, and her heart was filled with gladness. For she found that he was a man worthy of her love.

Later he had her calling on him, she refused to give him some of his own medicine. She allowed him to call, but received him in the kitchen, introduced the cook as her mother and in other ways tested his devotion. To her joy she found that his love for her could overlook and forgive all drawbacks, so in the end she revealed herself to him in her proper guise, and made him happy by agreeing to be his wife, and to motor through life by his side.

THE RESCUE OF MR. HENPECK.—Here are a few hundred feet of funny film that give an accurate depiction of a recent adventure of a certain chap by name of Henpeck, and must genuine entertainment will be afforded Apron String hubbies and some others.

POWERS.

HER ATONEMENT.—A peculiar circumstance brings young Howard Grey to know Nell, the famous female swindler, crook and genius of a little group of criminals of the opposite sex. She does not reveal her identity, nor does she know that one of the members of her band is Howard's own brother, who has fallen by the wayside and into evil ways. The latter plans the robbery of a necklace, a famous Grey heirloom, and Nell goes out on the job, but is unsuccessful, being discovered by Howard, who is charitable and lets her go. But the brother, the next day, brings the necklace into the den. Nell realizes that the man she respects has been robbed, and after a struggle gets out of the place, gives up the necklace and takes the jewel to the rightful owner of the family. And when, a few years later, she steps into the sunlight after her term in prison is over, Howard Grey is waiting for her at the gate.

THE STRANGER'S PLATE.—An Indian, wounded, weak and famished comes to the home of a peasant for help and is cursed back to health. But, his vigor restored, the mother and daughter decline to have him sit at the family table, although the kindly father pleads vigorously against this precedure. So the father gives the red man a generous basket of food and sends him on with his blessings.

Weeks later the older daughter, out picking flowers, is captured by the Indians and carried to their camp. The chief offers her as a squaw to the highest bidder. The red man who was betrothed by her father recognizes the girl as one of them who had refused him a seat at the table. He outbids the others and takes her to her father's home. In the meantime, the parents have discovered the loss of the daughter and are frantic with grief. And when the red man comes to them with the one who was lost and found again, all insist that he occupy a place of honor at the table with them, and they make haste to serve and comfort him.

BLACK HEART.—John Grant, who abhors gambling as thoroughly as he does wife-beating, and who, when he finds Thorne so chastising his wife, trounces him.

But don't think that the gambler relishes this. Rather, it creates in him a deep, abiding hate for Grant that is sure to find expression. Then he

SERVICE UNDER JOHNSTON AND LEE.—Robt Downey had married Alice Johnston, the general's daughter. Robert was living peacefully with his wife and child, when hostilities broke out.

One after sorrowful tidings came to Robert of his beloved ones. It was a message to say they were to be come and take their darling child to Gettysburg and to safety.

In the short conflict at Yellow Tavern, Robert fell from the hands of the enemy. The wife of his friend Jones and his friend Will Johnston were imprisoned. He decided on a desperate course. Pretending illness, he senters on guard, all unsuspecting, came to his side. In an instant Robert would him by the throat and bore him to the ground. He then donned his coat.

Horse garnered he reached the Confederate lines and was stopped before long to whom he told his story, convincing him the rescue was genuine. The general gave him a passport and attached him on the occasion. Making his way through the lines of the enemy, Robert had at last reached his home when the heartache passed in.

While the men started their search in one direction their officer turned in another, to find its passage blocked by the child. Soon her father was discovered but through the pleadings of his sons child the Union officer told his men that his search had been fruitless so they were permitted to pursue their way to freedom.

THE COST OF DRINK.—Bill Edwards, the foreman of F. Carson ranch, sees Marian Orme, but from the cars far. They become alone. Bob Langford, the proposes and is accepted. But Bob drinks, and in short comes to pass that he loses his fine feelings.

The happy comes no more. He goes to the Carson to the home of his sister for a visit. There he and acquaintance the last night and his sister's husband hang over their backs on him. He now has gone and finds. The next morning

ADVERTISING FOR MAMMA

A Child's Plea That Is Rewarded

Released Monday, June 7th. Length 1010 feet

A poor workingman and his wife are estranged. The husband with hard work and long hours becomes in a measure coarse and brutal. The wife in turn finally loses patience and courage and runs away, leaving a note stating that she cannot endure the hard, loveless life. The husband realizes the situation when too late. The family get along as best they can. The little girl keeps house for the father. Finally the man is injured through an accident on the dock where he is employed, and is confined to his bed. The little girl is in deep distress. At length Emmie has an idea. She proposes to advertise for her mamma. She is certain that if her mamma knew of their trouble she would come home. The plan is carried into effect, and with success.

There Are Real Heart Throbs In This Feature Production

THE LOVE OF SUMMER MORN

The Story of An Indian Maiden's Sacrifice

Released Friday, June 9th. Length 990 feet

A threatened Indian uprising sends the 13th Cavalry into camp. While scouting through the country a small party of soldiers drive their horses into a pool, thereby unwittingly profaning a sacred Indian spring. This incident takes place while the beautiful Indian girl Summer Morn is close to the spring. Calling her father, a strong protest is made against the sacrilege by the pale-faced soldiers. Lieutenant Bob, in charge of the scouting party, falls in love at first sight with the beautiful Indian girl. Pressing his suit, he finally gains the consent of her father to their marriage. The regiment, returning to headquarters, Bob's Indian wife is ostracized by the women of the post. Recognizing the unfortunate position Bob is placed in, Summer Morn, although dearly loving her husband, steals away to her own people. Big Bear, her father, hides her and leads Bob to think that she is dead.

Two years later Bob woos and wins Ruth. A camping honeymoon trip brings them into the Indian country. Accidentally meeting Summer Morn, Bob's old love instincts returns. The Indian girl, however, sends him away, and to make her sacrifice complete, throws herself into the sacred spring.

The scenes of this picture were taken in Sabinas Canon, a pass leading from the interior of California down to the Pacific Ocean and much used by the Indians during their occupancy of California.

THE MONOGRAM J. O.—When a woman sets out to purchase a shirt for a man, trouble is bound to ensue. Every woman knows. So, when Imbrecht a comic almost vicious taste for men's wear, and that all seems to attain a climax of torture in something more than shirts.

It all starts when Mrs. James Ogden decides to remember her husband's birthday. Being a woman, she decides to buy him a shirt because it's useful and something to wear. She monograms his initials on the shirt and the pattern she selected for both the shirt and the monogram was louder than a suffragette's meeting, and the innocent victim decides to make short order of it. As he goes on the road in a few days and to please Mrs. Ogden, he wears the shirt. In other words, he takes the "drummer" with him.

For shirt amusement Ogden whenever he goes and it decides to leave the shirt in the hotel with a fictitious name. He has succeeded it in the bureau drawers of the room he has occupied, and goes along to a happy thought of relief.

Without knowing, also is traveling salesman, stops at the same hotel a few days later and when saving in turn across the shirt with the monogram J. O. in with it. Immediately. At once dark thoughts enter his mind. His wife had packed his grip, where did she get that shirt from? Who is J. O.? Perhaps a couple of days' infidelity tear his heart and he writes her demanding to know all about the shirt. His wife is puzzled, perplexed, and heartbroken over the accusation, and to vindicate her honor and solve the queer mystery, she hires a detective. He visits the hotel and finds that the man who occupied the room previous to Mr. Smith was James Ogden, J. O., and after discovering this, he gets the forwarding book and finds Ogden's home address and starts out to have Ogden explain. Meanwhile, Ogden returns home and his wife inquires for the whereabouts of the shirt. Ogden replies he has sent it to the laundry. The truth dawns on him when he realizes that he must return and get the shirt and he is much worried to know how to arrange matters when the detective arrives and saves Ogden from a situation that might prove serious. He agrees to face Mr. Smith and tell him all about it. He makes it possible for the Smiths to go on their merital way in peace with doubt and misgivings dispelled. The reel is full of laughable situations and situations worth laughing at.

Every thing new and improved (not the Film Laboratory and Motor Van Theatre, many all products strictly original—what others offer as Special or Novelty, as old and common with us. We have a new fast and safe-cut Motion Picture Camera and we can build a lot more men intriguing ones to order—all perfect. Types all different. We keep in stock the greatest Perforating and Printing Machines Extants, Title Developing Outfits, Chemicals, Laboratory secrets, Film Stock and Film work, Perforating and Printing done, Winders, Rewinders, Measurers, Menders, Cleaners, not cheap, but lasting and practical. If you have condenser or lense trouble come to us with our long, practical knowledge in Optics.

The new Mirror Vitæ, single illuminant, double dissolving Stereopticon, Motion Picture combined; with only one arc—is the coming machine—you want no others if you see this; why don't you come and look at it—it's put up in our showroom—we show it to everybody, makes no difference if it is you or your office boy. Our new Motion Picture head with the correct inside shutter is a great improvement; we had him outside 15 years ago, now we have him inside. It looks as if other machine manufacturers are getting childish. Our machine is not spiderwebbed by the trust and is protected by eight United States Patents, with good fundamental claims, and you will want one had some day, no matter how they roast them to you—your own common sense will dictate to you. Listen: Half the current, half the paraphernalia, half the weight, half the current, double the light and half the trouble—no more slide and condenser cracking—with this machine the operator feels like a man and not like a slave; and the picture is so much more beautiful, life true and eyeresting. In another machine which will be ready in a month for demonstration we project a frame of light around the motion picture in addition to above features, all with but one arc of low amperage. The way of projecting a frame of light around the motion pictures as shown in the Herst method had been discarded by us in 1900 and this new way has been patented as being more valuable; our device also changes colors. We make high class effect slides of never seen beauty. Our new wire terminal should be used by you exclusively—none half as good. The government is using our products, why not you? Because you don't know us. We advertise little—our goods advertise themselves.

We had the first machines in operation in New York; we made the first M. P. machine dissolving and plain Stereopticon combined (ask Powers). We had the first Film Framing Device, but did not monopolize it. All machines now in use made good money out of our ideas, and we became so poor that we had to buy this 6-story building to devote it to a home of modern Cinematography in America. We also have a beautiful conservatory here and good drinking water for the thirsty—why not get in touch with me; we will teach you the science of Mirror Vitæ, which is so real different from what you have ever seen; no matter how long you have been in the business—come and find out that the motion picture industry is a science. See our demonstration on 10 years' advanced machinery. We do not belong to the Trust nor to the Independents—we call them Friends—we are Neutral, and every one interested is welcome to us.

If you can't call—write for catalogues on whatever you are interested.

is a story of the pitfalls that await the country boy in the Big City. There are shoals of them, and he shouldn't forget it. This reel will make him remember. But aside from the moral value of the film, it carries an interest-value that will be appreciated by those who aren't country boys. In point of interest of story, many think it the best Thanhouser release of the month. And the city scenes are even better than those in our "City of Her Dreams" of last year. No. 219. is the famous fire picture that was mentioned in all the leading newspapers of the country when a house in New Rochelle was burned down expressly for it. We took many more hundreds of feet of the fire than we needed, and reserved the most realistic of it for this reel. The picture is even more sensational than our recent "Railroad Builder," and will prove a striking example of what Thanhouser skill, Thanhouser brains and Thanhouser enterprise can do for your box office. You will be amazed at the rescue of the child, the bravery of the bucket brigade and the total destruction of the house. No. 220. Code word, Flame.

MONEY IN THE BANK

Showing How Money Does the Work

Released Wednesday, June 14th. Length 960 feet

BERTIE finds a bank book showing a small credit to the owner. The same day his landlady tells him he must pay up or skidoo. He gets an idea. Taking the bank book he writes in deposits amounting to $50,000. That night at dinner he apparently unconsciously drops the bank book in the dining room where it is found by one of the young lady boarders and shown to everyone in the house. This means instantaneous popularity for Bertie. The landlady from that time on cannot do enough for him. She consents to his marriage with her daughter and insists on showering attentions galore upon him, much to the disgust of the other men boarders. The final outcome causes the ladies of the household to bemoan their fate and the men to rejoice.

Real Comedy Containing a Laugh Every Minute.

THE RAILROAD RAIDERS OF '62

A True Incident of the American Civil War.

Released Wednesday, June 16. Length 1000 feet.

The General commanding a Division of the Federal Army calls for volunteers to go on a railroad raiding expedition within the Confederate lines. A number of men quickly respond and under the leadership of Capt. Andrews evade the enemy's patrol, swim a river and arrive safely in the enemy's country. At Big Shanty they capture an engine and flat car from a train crew, run out on the line a few miles and begin tearing up the track. In the meantime, the train crew from whom the raiders stole the engine notify the nearest Confederate officers and another engine and car in charge of Confederate soldiers is sent in pursuit. The race for life and final capture of the fleeing Union men are graphically portrayed in this historically correct motion picture story.

The survivors of the Andrews Raiders, upon whose exploit this story is based, have erected a monument to their fallen comrades, and it stands today in the National Cemetery at Chattanooga. The engine is reproduced in miniature on top of the monument, and on the left hand side is a die containing the names of the "Raiders" who were executed in Atlanta; on the right hand side, a die containing the names of the eight who escaped from prison at Atlanta; and at the rear a die containing the names of those exchanged.

Vol. 8 JUNE 10, 1911 No. 23

The Dearth of Comedy.

Reams have been written in this and other papers about the dearth of comedy in moving picture subjects. So far it would seem that words have been wasted. In spite of all that has been written there is as much lack of good comedy today as there was a year ago. Protests from all sources have gone unheeded. The prayer of the exhibitor remains unanswered. Occasionally there is a flash in the pan in the way of bright comedy, but it is soon swamped in the avalanche of tragedy.

In moving pictures the tragedy outnumbers the comedy at a ratio something like 16 to 1. It has been suggested time and again that if some film manufacturing company were to make a specialty of comedy, and comedy only, it would in time establish a reputation as a comedy house to which all exhibitors would turn in their time of need, and there feel sure that relief could be found from the doleful doings of the morbid.

The world is too serious to be made any more so by rubbing it in. The average man one meets is serious. He may have cheerful moments, or even indulge in frivolity at certain times, but these periods are a drop in the bucket to the seriousness of the average business man. Just why people should be so serious as they are is rather hard to explain.

Taking the American public as a whole, they work very hard and they play very hard. Business during the day is an awful thing; awful in its seriousness. But once business is over the American people plunge into their amusements with a vigor that amounts almost to debauchery. They are hungry for a laugh and they are going to get it at any price. They want relief from the seriousness of the day, and it is not to be expected that their feelings are going to be much relieved by putting them through an ordeal of thrills and tears. "Laugh and grow fat," says the proverb. We fail to remember any such approving sentiment bearing upon tragedy.

After having written what seems to us like a large volume on the subject of more comedy and less tragedy, we thought it would be a good idea to ask a film manufacturer why he did not specialize his business, and make it a house of comedy. His reply was, in substance, that a film house cannot build itself a lasting reputation on comedy. His argument was that comedy is quickly forgotten, whereas tragedy sinks deeper into the heart and is remembered. By this he probably meant that if he produced a real good dramatic film that its life would be much longer than the life of an ephemeral comedy. Comedies are all right but they do not last, would sum up his idea of the thing.

Now it happened that a few days after the above interview, we were at a sociable where moving pictures were being exhibited. Among other pictures shown was that old comedy standby, "The Runaway Horse," which is nearly four years old. Also an old Pathe reel known as "Jim Gets a New Job," which verges a little on horseplay, and which is also nearly four years old. As in days gone by, these reels at that select gathering were as much of a "riot" as they were when they came out, and in all probability they will be a riot twenty years from now wherever they are shown. It sounds wrong for a producer to make the remark that one cannot gain a lasting reputation by turning out comedy. Charles A. Hoyt is remembered with pleasure whenever his name is spoken, and his plays are still being played, and hold their own with any dramas of the "Old Homestead" type.

The trouble does not lie in any forebodings about a grand reputation. The trouble is that it takes brains to be funny. Anybody can be serious and anybody can be tragic, but there are few who can command a laugh at will. Comedy is a gift, a talent which in its higher form is very rare. Being rare, it is of course worth money. It is a well-known fact that some of our film producers are parsimonious when it comes to paying for talent. Brains are required in putting together and acting a successful comedy. It requires thought and thought must be paid for.

People go to picture shows not because they want to cry. They have troubles of their own. Manufacturers do not seem to understand this, and continue putting over these "weepers" on the assumption that tragedy is remembered where comedy is forgotten. Some races prefer tragedy. For instance, the Russians, whose lives are more or less each a separate tragedy, or perhaps the Italian, who prefers a little blood-letting in his picture. But are we going to keep on forever pandering to vulgar tastes and morbid instincts? Is the moving picture never going to rise above the level of old world drama or modern dime novel ideas? Yes. And the manufacturer who leads the way will realize not only profit, but lasting fame.

Taxation Without Representation

A couple of weeks ago we were talking about a jury trial for picture men in one of these editorial paragraphs, and we spoke of how the exhibitor likes to give an imitation of a disgusted, and allow every peanut politician and rattle-headed reformer to wipe their feet on him. The exhibitor becomes dulled to his rights, and after a while forgets that he has any rights at all. These things we touched upon in that editorial, therefore we will not go over them again.

One thing we have always noticed, however, in this connection, has been the scarcity or absence of the moving picture man from deliberations of which he is the principal object. There are very few boards or committees that we have heard of, that have as their object an investigation of moving pictures, with which there is a moving picture man identified. As a rule the exhibitor is like the poor fellow on the operating table waiting for the doctors to decide whether they will cut his diaphragm or his frying-pan. If he pulls through, the operation is a success. If he dies, according to foreordination, it was his day to die, and that is all there is to it. In either case the patient has no word in the consultation over his ailments. The doctors decide what the trouble is with him, without consulting him, and operate accordingly.

It is quite a notorious fact that the exhibitor is seldom represented on any committee that is appointed or organized to deal with moving pictures. We have been reading of censorship boards from Maine to California. Likewise of child welfare movements and anti-crime societies, etc., etc., and of all the names that we have gone over in connection with these, the scarcest are those of moving picture men.

In the matter of license, aldermen get together and put the license figure just exactly where they please without consulting the moving picture man in the remotest degree. In nearly every city of the Union the exhibitor is up against a case of taxation without representation in its most flagrant form. Who ever heard of an alderman exhibitor? Very few of us. The nearest an exhibitor ever gets to speaking in a council chamber is to come there as a pleader, begging for them to be easy with him. A moving picture manager has as much opportunity to be a popular man as any other citizen; perhaps more. Why are there not more moving picture aldermen?

In civic societies, we have seldom noted the name of any person who is prominent as an exhibitor, and they are in a woful minority on censorship boards. To our minds this state of affairs denotes a lack of aggressiveness on the part of moving picture men. Exhibitors are notorious for locking the barn door after the horse has been stolen. It seldom occurs to them to use their talent for "butting-in" and getting the upper hand in any of the local movements that make rough traveling for the picture show.

The exhibitors have not been as militant in dignifying the business as they might have been. By this we do not mean that there are not men in the business who are not doing their part, for there are many, but when compared with the vast number of exhibitors in America, they are comparatively few. There are some exhibitors from whom we can never expect anything in the way of uplift, and for these must be predicted something in the way of downfall. These remarks we are addressing particularly to those high class exhibitors who have enough education and refinement and manhood to appreciate the fuller meaning of life and citizenship. It is to these we look in the hope that moving picture men will be aggressive enough to get themselves on as many local committees as possible, especially those which deal with the motion picture question. It is to them we look also for more work toward the good repute and dignity of the moving picture and its establishment as a local institution on a par with the library, the school and the church.

The Will o' the Wisp

One of the hardest things to locate in New York City, and no doubt Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia and every other city, is the successful film that was run yesterday. Nearly every day some friend of ours will come to us in an enthusiastic way and describe the fine points of a moving picture he saw the night before, with the parting reminder that if we do not see it, we will be missing one of the best films that has been turned out in a month.

Sometimes a description of a film will be so vivid and enthusiastic that we are tempted at once to get on the track of it and see it for ourselves. Our first thought, of course, is to call up an exchange, and find out where the picture is booked for today. We usually find it booked out of town for today and perhaps for tomorrow. When we inquire where it will be two days after tomorrow, the exchange itself cannot tell us where it will be. We then call up another exchange, and they tell us that the film is away up in the Bronx or down at Coney Island or some other place, which is too far away for us to spare the time in making the journey to see it.

In this manner have we called up nearly every exchange, but we do not do it any more. To them it is a bother and waste of time, and to us a waste of many nickels trying to locate the wonderful film we have heard of. Only once in a blue moon does the film happen to land on the second day within walking distance of this office where we may scurry out at lunch time and see it and back again. In this way we are disappointed many times. During a month we feel that we are missing many of the things that life holds good. The film that is described in glowing terms is always the one we fail to see. Thus it will be seen that we are the victims of a cruel system, and that system is the change daily idea.

We ourselves know how it feels to miss a fine film and for that reason we imagine that the public at large, being human, must experience the same sensation or feeling of disappointment as we do. When one member of a family comes home from the picture show and dwells gushingly upon a screaming comedy or exquisite scenic, the chances are that the other members of the family would go to see it the next night, but, alas, it is too late. The public is usually twenty-four hours behind the moving picture. It seldom knows what a good thing it has missed until a day after. Hence the many inquiries of the manager, if the much talked of film will be exhibited again tonight. To this the bland manager answers "no" in a mysterious way, supposed to denote great wisdom or something of the kind. The humble patron retires as gracefully as possible after this gentle turn-down and allows to himself that, no doubt, the manager must know what he is about and gives him credit for possessing a supernatural wisdom. There are many ordinary theatergoers who have an idea that it requires a superman to be a theater manager, when the plain facts of the matter are that it requires more common sense to run a theater than it needs mysterious ways.

There is not much more to say on the subject. The change daily idea is the underlying cause of it all. When managers realize that a good film is worth keeping two days or more, it will be possible to see a film that is being talked about. But as things stand at present, what is the good of a film being talked about, when no one can see it a day after it is talked about?

A Worthy Charity

Our Indianapolis correspondent has sent us an interesting bit of news which embodies one of the latest and best ideas we have noticed in some little time. The action of the Indianapolis exhibitors in conducting a charitable institution of their own puts quite a different construction on giving Sunday shows for charity.

A close observer will notice that the charitable institution in most towns or cities is conducted by some leading merchant or other person who has something to sell. Charitable work is good advertising, especially for the dry goods merchant or the banker or any other local establishment of the kind. It is this gentry, which assumes to be ultra charitable, that has given the greatest amount of trouble to showmen in general and moving picture men in particular.

Whenever an earthquake or a great fire takes place, it is usually the self-advertising dry goods merchant who promptly organizes a relief fund for the sufferers, who may be thousands upon thousands of miles away or close to home, as the case may be. A few days afterwards, it usually occurs to a moving picture man to give a Sunday show in his theater for the benefit of the unfortunate victims of said disaster, but he finds that the market is already cornered by the local merchant prince or some other local self-advertiser, it makes no difference what his vocation.

In order to give his performance, therefore, the moving picture man must consult the great charitable man whose name is always in the newspapers for the good things he is doing (with other people's money). By surrendering all his rights to the charity man, the exhibitor is allowed to give a Sunday show, but he is not trusted to take care of the funds. That important function is reserved for the employees of said merchant prince. A Sunday benefit, as one will readily see, is an excellent chance for the charity man, whoever he may be, to swing in a fat day's pay for his salesmen, saleswomen and friends as cashiers and ticket-takers. Thus does he ingratiate himself, not only with the public, but those who work for him as well. His reasons for being charitable are not always a deep secret.

The moving picture man is not to be trusted, it seems, to handle charitable funds. He is supervised by some one whose own honesty is an unknown quantity, so far as he is concerned. Exhibitors in many cities have been insulted far too often in this way by having a shoe clerk step in on Sunday and supervise their shows, and it is pleasing to note the way in which the Indianapolis exhibitors have solved the Sunday charity show proposition. They have organized their own charitable institution. They are directly responsible for it. If there is any incidental advertising that goes with it, they will get the benefit of it and not the other man.

The Indianapolis charity is well organized; it helps the poor in a more sensible way than the majority of organized charities are known to do. Their charity institution is "almost human," which is a great deal more than can be said of the usual local charity. There is no valid law anywhere that we know of which can prevent the exhibitors in any city from getting together and establishing a bona fide charitable institution, nor has any pompous town charity man any special right to "butt-in" and demand to know the inside facts. The exhibitor is a citizen, and has as much right to conduct a charitable institution as any other business man.

We would advise exhibitors to try out this excellent plan. It will gain them a world of popularity, if conducted honestly. The idea is only one of the many possibilities of the moving picture that are putting in appearance day after day, and it is not beyond our wildest dreams to have the local picture magnate viewed with respect by his townspeople as a charitable man, in the real sense of the word.

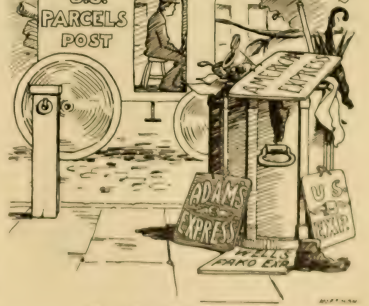
Moving Pictures in Madison Sq. Garden.

There is considerable in our columns this week concerning Madison Square Garden as a moving picture house, but in our opinion the subject will warrant all that has been written, and perhaps more. The installation of moving pictures in Madison Square Garden is one of the most important events that has happened in many months.

We visited the Garden recently to get a line on the situation up to the present time. At this writing the pictures have occupied the Garden for one week. According to Capt. Dressel, manager of the Garden, the patronage has increased steadily on each succeeding day, and the outlook is good. It was our desire to find out principally whether the Garden had been leased by an outside showman or whether the moving picture show was conducted by the Garden management direct. The idea is that of Captain Dressel whose business it is to make the Garden pay. Madison Square Garden has not paid a dollar in the last ten years. Captain Dressel says that during those ten years the Garden has stood idle four months out of every year during the summer.

The moving picture show now running in the Garden came as a ray of hope to the manager of the Garden as a means of making up the summer deficit. Expense goes on at Madison Square Garden during the summer months, for it is a building of various activities. But the amphitheatre itself has lain dormant in the summertime always. Whatever revenue comes in from moving pictures, according to Captain Dressel himself, is "velvet."

Later on, we shall dwell at further length on the picture proposition in Madison Square Garden. Our contributors have discussed in their separate columns the possibilities and probabilities of the same in this week's issue, so we will not encroach upon their space. Suffice it to say that if moving pictures are the means of saving Madison Square Garden, the incident will be the greatest boost that moving pictures ever had, and it will endear them to thousands of people for saving an institution that seems to be tottering.



Parcels Post—When do we get it?

With Accompanying Noises

By Harry Caswell Hall.

And being the person who does things, with a certain project, resolutely, etc., to even the manager of a picture house, being in fact one of the public, it is with considerable trepidation that I emerge from the humble and unpretentious silence and becoming in one of the noted accompanyists' chairs. But I am impelled by a force stronger than my will to have speech!

Why the strange notes that some managers, at some extreme to themselves, inflict upon an absolutely unoffending gathering of persons who have come to see motion pictures? Not those produced by the piano, which, being sentiment, may be ignored by an experienced picture fiend, just as one may become used to and finally fail to hear the roar of elevated trains past the window. I refer to those intermittent jangles, squeaks, bangs, plangs, groans and toots, which are supposed to add realism to the pictures. If there exists anything more absurd and childish than the sound-effect it has never been my misfortune to encounter it. Subdued chimes appropriately suggestive are the only additions to the regular music that seem to me to harmonize with the atmosphere created by the pictures. I, of course, except a pipe organ, classing this, when used, as part of the regular music.

Silence is an absolute prerequisite to a full understanding and appreciation of a photoplay—at least the absence of any noises which specifically and sharply attract the attention, as irrelevant spoken words, for instance. The accompanying music, when the picture is properly played, does not attract the conscious attention. Not one spectator in twenty, at the conclusion of a good film, can tell what air has been played, if the musician has been in harmony with the subject shown. I very much doubt the propriety of playing such familiar airs as "Dixie," "Star Spangled Banner," "Old Folks at Home," and "Old Kentucky Home" unless the demand is most obvious and the dramatic situation such that nothing will be lost to the spectator by a division of attention, such as a scene in a Civil War drama wherein the soldiers simply march away to the front, this marching away constituting the essential action of the scene. In an instance of this kind, "Yankee Doodle" or "Dixie" may be indulged in to the limit of the musician's ability, with excellent results. The practise of some musicians of seizing upon some incidental and non-essential action as a peg whereon to hang a "popular" air, the words of which happen to fit that individual action, but which are entirely out of harmony with the theme of the play is, to a real picture lover, little short of criminal.

However, the question of appropriate music is receiving the attention of persons more competent to speak than I, though the sound-effect vandalism seems to have escaped its proper condemnation.

Does a drummer's vocation impair the brain, or do persons with brains fight shy of this particular line? With a few happy exceptions to prove the rule, it would seem that one of the two propositions is true. For proof drop into any picture show where the management has recklessly put onto the hands of the drummer person a collection of noise toys. He is a single-minded individual, and his reasoning is as simple as adding two and two. Suppose a pastoral play is on the screen. At considerable inconvenience, to give proper color, the property man has introduced several sheep which graze placidly in the background. In the foreground the little country lass is reading the letter which tells her that she is forsaken by the handsome city man to whom she has given her heart. She weeps. Do we hear the sobs that shake her young breast? Hardly. The fool with the toys gets busy on quite another line. He sees a sheep, and has a toy built for just such a contingency. He bursts into a series of baa-baas, and some ass laughs. That is the height of achievement, to get a laugh, even if you have to imitate the squalling of a baby while a heart-broken mother bends over her child's deathbed, on the screen.

Because the effects are sometimes mishandled does not detract from their effectiveness when properly handled, some manager who has invested will retort. Well, no, we will admit that, supposing they can be properly handled. But the sound-artist would have to have as many hands as a centipede has legs, and about a carload of effects to "sound" an average picture. Take a battle scene, for instance. Can anything be more absurd than a futile little popping, when the spectator can see twenty shots fired for every one he hears; when he knows that if he could really hear what he sees, it would be a crashing roar, a thunderous medley of cannon, musketry, shouting, and trampling? The locomotive whistle is a trump card, maybe. We see an express train tearing along, and from down front comes a life-like little toot-toot! Fine. An engine and train of cars slides across the screen with as much noise as a cloud shadow across a meadow, but we get the toot-toot all right. Ever see kids "playin' train," chasing themselves around the block or along park paths, with arms working like an engine's drivers? They also give vent to frequent toot-toots, and sometimes add chew-chew-chew as long as breath holds out. But some of us who go to picture shows are not kids.

The auto-horn even outclasses the locomotive whistle in point of popularity, for the reason that the drummer-person gets five or ten chances to blow that where one locomotive has been provided. Therefore we are treated to a merry honk-honk when an automobile comes down a crowded city street, while cars, trucks and horses flit noiselessly by like visions in a fevered brain. To make this occasional-sound business approach intelligence, it would be necessary to presuppose a condition of hearing somewhat corresponding to color blindness, only infinitely greater in effect; the ability to hear sounds only of a peculiar and determined nature.

The "silent drama" is sufficiently attractive and clear to the intelligence without any audible explanations; when the average patron sees a dog on the screen he knows it is a dog without a succession of "bow-wows." If what is being shown is supposed to be a silent drama, for heaven's sake let it be silent. If you can produce every sound, or even every major sound which would be heard in actual life, I beg to congratulate you and will try to give your place a visit if anywhere this side of Mozambique. Even at that I am afraid it would seem a little absurd to hear the crash when father falls down the cellar stairs with a scuttle of coal in each hand, and to remain deaf to what he says—we would just know he was saying a lot. Or to fail to hear the villain's shriek for mercy, and have our ears split by the crack of the hero's trusty pistol as he sends said villain to his final accounting. However, the all-sounds-but-human-speech-reproduced show would not be intolerable—there is too much talking done, anyway—but for the sake of common sense cut out the sound-effect or use it with brains.

Will Moving Pictures Save Madison Sq. Garden?

By Robert Grau.

The pessimists who preach the doctrine of retrogression in connection with the moving picture theatre can hardly regard with equanimity or joy the advent of Madison Square Garden as a factor in the ever-increasing vogue of the camera-man.

Will this tremendous institution, which has for a generation been the pride of the great metropolis, have its problem solved at last? Will the moving picture (which has stood every test to which it has been put, and has solved the problems of a score of New York's theatres after manager after manager had been bankrupted) serve to prevent the superb old edifice from being demolished and the site yielding to the demands of progress? Who can tell? But stranger things can happen than that the immense public of the East Side many find here a vast resort for entertainment, for it is a fact that New York, unlike London, is without what are called "neighborhood theatres."

The vast amphitheatre has been made most inviting for the new régime, yet although its career in the field of cinematography was inaugurated almost without preliminary notice or advertising, the immense auditorium was well filled on the opening night, and the audience seemed to be comfortably seated.

In my humble opinion, in view of the fact that the big Garden has never had any compelling attraction for the summer months, the management might have made the general admission to all parts of the house ten cents, at least at the outset; that extra five cents may prove a regretful mistake. I have never believed in any compromise prices in public catering, and every great financial success that has been achieved in the last forty years has resulted when the concession to the public has been absolute. The proprietors of this truly great enterprise undoubtedly gave much thought to the question of an admission scale, and that they adopted a uniform price of fifteen cents to all parts shows that an effort was made to place the entrance prices at the lowest commensurate with the dignity of the famous institution, but this is where they may find they have made their great mistake. Had they made the admission five and ten cents, the success would have been instantaneous and pronounced, and with a city of five million souls the amount of money that the big Garden could take in from noon to midnight would compare favorably with any of the big records achieved at the Garden in its interesting history.

So much is at stake in this undertaking, for I am certain that we are emerging into the era of expansion of the motion picture, that anything likely to discourage the prime movers in this endeavor is greatly to be deplored. Two or three years ago a few shrewd men like Marcus Loew, William Fox and F. F. Proctor began to convert regular theatres into a usage that had outgrown the store theatre, and at that time I prophesied that these theatre would become larger and more beautiful and elaborate at each stage of progress.

Now we see theatres like the American and the New York taken on because of their capacity, while Mr. Loew is erecting two enormous theatres in the heart of the city and involving an outlay of one million dollars.

It has remained for the moving picture to attract vast capital into the amusement calling. Previous to its advent it was well nigh impossible to entice men of conservatism and commercial rectitude into a business famous for its vicissitudes and uncertainties, but today a fair computation justifies the statement that fifty million dollars is now invested or available for investment in the moving picture and minor vaudeville field, and ninety-five per cent. of this has been provided by men who five years ago would have refused absolutely to make a theatrical investment. Moreover, such men as Felix Isman, George B. Cox, Joseph L. Rhinock, Nixon & Zimmerman and Keith & Proctor would part far quicker with their holdings in the regular theatre line than those they possess in the gold-laden field which has so enriched them.

There are always to be found men who can see a retrograde movement, and the end of the moving picture has been predicted each year by them, only to result in some remarkable new feature, such as the advent of the Madison Square Garden, to greatly enhance the now dignified and exalted calling.

Wherever I turn, I find men who have seen the futility of investing further in theatrical property and are now seeking locations for building theatres for moving pictures and vaudeville, and the very character of these theatres and their costliness is the best evidence of what the projectors think about the longevity of the vogue.

The class of men now interested in cinematography is best illustrated to me in the case of the gentleman who won the prize granted by the Essanay Company of one hundred dollars for suggesting the title of photoplay. This man was Edgar Strakosch, of the family of impresarios, and he himself has always been identified with such attractions as Patti, Bernhardt, Nielson, and was for years the acting manager of the Metropolitan Opera House. A few years ago he decided to locate in California, and he entered the moving picture field; but he is but one of many, and now that the Madison Square Garden is an added asset, too much importance cannot be given to this new phase of the picture situation, for on the outcome of this particular venture will depend the inauguration of a new era of uplift, which will carry the entire industry up to such an exalted state that the pessimists, to whom I referred at the outset of this article, will "come a cropper" for all time.

[Motion pictures will not save the Garden—at least not as they are now being shown there. We have visited the show several times and noticed very poor projection due to defective equipment. If the management will install up-to-date apparatus and enhance the pictures with good orchestra music—in other words, put on the picture as it ought to be and as it is not done anywhere in New York City—they will not only save the Garden, but make money for the company.—Ed. M. P. W.]

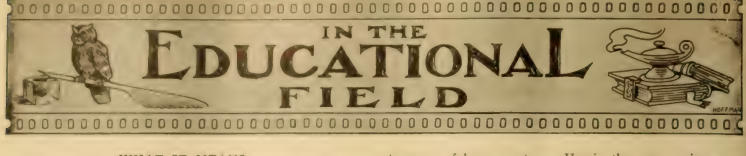
Celluloid Film Stock Again in Use.

After two years experience in the exclusive use of non-inflammable film, the licensed manufacturers have decided to give exchanges the choice of either non-inflammable or the ordinary film.

From this date exchanges may specify in their orders their preference for either the ordinary or the non-inflammable film and manufacturers will, in so far as is possible, supply the kind of film preferred.

After July 1, 1911, all manufacturers will be able to supply the kind of film stock that the exchanges specify.

In supplying motion pictures on the ordinary film to exhibitors who are accustomed to the use of non-inflammable film, every exchange should direct the attention of the exhibitor to the more inflammable nature of the ordinary film.



WHAT IT MEANS.

The extraordinary movement recorded last week, whereby the moving picture fraternity throughout the country were made acquainted with the fact that the world-wide famous Madison Square Garden had become a moving picture place must have aroused singular feelings of wonder and satisfaction. Such a move as this is of too much importance to be passed over with the simple announcement of the fact; this is one of those incidents which may change the entire current of public opinion as to the universal attitude which the pictures demand shall be accorded them.

Pregnant with important issues, it is of value that an analysis of the situation should be made to discover, if possible, what this latest move portends.

In the first place, it must be said that it is one of great moral importance.

Nowhere have the moving pictures fought—even for their very existence—more than in this metropolis of the United States. All classes of authorities have scanned, searched and criticized every phase of moving picture work; whatever there was of good was always minimized; whatever of bad, magnified, until at one time it was looked upon as a moral scourge. Rising steadily above these criticisms, shaking off the shell of errors and faults in which it was incubated, the moving picture has proved its own character, and with wise direction in proper hands has become a recognized factor in the moral well-being of the people. From the old unrentable store on a back street to the greatest exhibition hall in the city is a wonderful promotion, speaking well for the way in which popular cinematography has impressed itself on the great surface of the public mind.

* * *

In its exalted position, the machine in operation in Madison Square Garden is calling to all its fellows in all parts of the world to appreciate its honors, and to make themselves worthy associates. In the highest places in life, the best is demanded. "Those who know demand the best" was an article written by this pen a few months ago; how singularly this is being fulfilled; what a mightier spirit of enterprise will come upon all interested in the production of anything—artistic or mechanical—in the Moving Picture World. Higher aims and loftier purposes will now inspire them. For has not their favored protégé been recognized, valued and installed in high places? No more catering for the few here, or the class there. No more anxiety about avoiding this criticism or that censure. Moving picture people have found the level upon which they can and must move, the ascent by which they must climb, and the heights to which they may attain.

In the Hall of Exhibitions, the center of progress, the moving picture now holds sway. To the New Yorker, as to the visitor to New York, it is always profitable to go to Madison Square. It is the exhibition hall of progress; nothing is allowed there but that which is worthy or valuable; whatever emanates from there is established. Thus, the moving picture has its greatest possibilities opened before it; if, at the end of the summer the verdict of an authoritative approval is pronounced in accord with the reputation of the place, it will not be long before Madison Square will show upon its well known tower the brilliant words, "Exhibition of Cinematography," while within shall be gathered together the World's First Exhibition of moving pictures, as applied to the amusements, arts and sciences of the times.

The moving pictures have been installed in Madison Square to "make it pay." What a twofold compliment, first to the picture as a drawing power; then to the fact that the people are drawn by it to an extent that financial profits accrue. Financiers are not only good business men but keen observers of human nature. Herein they are paying—perhaps unwittingly—a strange and valuable compliment to the great power which cinematography is wielding in the world. It is said that $75,000,000 has been paid in moving picture developments. Such a vast sum commands a response in the market of the world; and, now that the word "millions," whether applied to people or dollars, is coupled in common parlance with moving pictures, there is every reason to feel that it is rapidly passing from its "infancy stage" so often referred to, into one of the established stability.

In looking over the world of attractions, the officials of Madison Square Garden found nothing responsive to their requirements, or that could meet the objects of their search for a profitable solution of the financial dilemma in which they were placed. An exhibition is not feasible or profitable in summer; a theater is not especially attractive, and, as actors come high, is too costly. What shall it be? No longer is the answer "The Play," "The play's the thing"—but a newer one, the picture! The picture's the thing! And so the picture occupies the unique position distinctively of filling a vacancy, supplying a need, and securing a profit which nothing else could procure. In this review, enough has been said to gladden the hearts of lovers of "the pictures" to satisfy the ambition of cinematographists, in making them all ambitious to show to the world that the attainment of this position of supremacy, while the top of one ascent, is but the first step in another, placing it on the threshold of a newer and greater future.

THE MOST DANGEROUS ANIMAL IN THE WORLD.

"The Ladies Home Journal," in a very instructive article says: "If the question were asked, 'What is the most dangerous animal in the world?' the answer would probably be 'the lion' or 'the rattlesnake.' But it would be far from the truth. The lion always gives a warning growl before springing, while the snake sounds its rattles before striking. The really 'most dangerous animal' comes upon its prey in a rambling, genial way, flying the flag of sociability. It is the housefly." What has revealed this strange truth and brought to light this dangerous "animal?" and wherein is it so dangerous? To these questions the only answer is: Educational Cinematography. The "Journal" illustrates its article with a short series of pictures entitled "The Actual Travels of a Fly as Caught by a Moving Picture Machine." The pictures show the danger of the "animal" by illustrating "how flies carry contagion," which compels people to give attention to and show an interest in this subject hitherto deemed unnecessary. "A fly crawls over a piece of decaying fish, then over a lump of sugar, next into a cuspidor, then it finds its way to the nipple of a baby's feeding-bottle, or into a dish of food on the table." Thus, thousands of people who see this film in all parts of the country are given to understand in what way this "animal" wages his death-dealing war against humanity.

This cinematographic discovery will lead to one of the most health-giving remedies with which the human family can be blest, as everyone after learning the lesson this picture teaches, will become an uncompromising enemy of the common housefly.

When it is computed that there are twenty deaths a day in New York as a result of the germ-carrying fly, it is easy to see that it will not be long before a new era of cleanliness as a result of the exterpiation of this pest is at hand. Again it is a pleasure to record another combined scientific discovery and household benefit, which the moving picture brings to us for the common good of all. The ever-increasing facilities brought to domestic uses by the enlargement upon the screen of subjects hitherto only written, the range of the scientist with his microscope, is making the moving picture the most popular instructor possible to imagine; its field of usefulness is as unlimited as are its beneficient purposes—the health and happiness of everybody.

In spite of the fact that moving picture theaters and halls form the larger percentage of amusement places at Coney Island, but very few of them suffered by reason of the five million dollar fire at that place last week. There was really only one large picture place on the area covered by the conflagration. Dreamland Park and large scenic and other railway attractions covered most of the place affected. In almost any other part of the island the loss to moving picture house owners would have been enormous.

There is not a burlesque show on Coney Island this season, all have been wiped out by the municipal authorities and nearly the whole of them have been transformed into moving picture places. This has created an unusual demand for operators and picture supply.

* * *

During a tour of the places recently I found much dissatisfaction existing on the part of managements, both as to the pictures and operators. As to the former the complaint is that there never was a season when film renters received such poor service as is furnished by film exchanges at the present time. Several managers complained that it seems almost impossible to secure suitable programs, or rather a suitable selection of pictures. The people in charge of the exchange distributing rooms seem to be either incapable of making proper selections for an exhibitor, or wholly indifferent as to what they hand out. It is a common thing for an exhibitor to be handed day after day a full program of dramatic productions. Appeals for comedies seem to fall upon deaf ears.

One manager who has had an experience of several years in the business stated that he knew for a fact that an employe of an exchange who makes selections for the customers is almost absolutely ignorant of the character of the subjects. His operator failed to secure satisfaction, so the manager went to the exchange himself. He called upon the manager, who disclaimed any responsibility, adding that the people in direct charge of the film room took care of the distribution of reels and had full discretion in the selection of them. When handed his reels by the party in charge, who happened this time to be a young woman, the exhibitor did not look at his list, or the titles of the films, but asked which of them were comedies, scenics or dramatics. The young woman replied she did not know, as she seldom saw any of the subjects projected and in making the selections she was guided only by the titles. Whatever struck her fancy she gave to the exhibitors.

There is something radically wrong in connection with this part of the picture business, and if some remedy is not provided very soon the interests of all concerned must suffer materially. The complaints are quite general and emphatic. Some of the exhibitors declare that with the pictures they are getting it is difficult to hold an audience. Consecutive production of either dramas or comedies become so monotonous that the patrons walk out on the flashing of titles. It is claimed that there are enough subjects produced to give exhibitors a better deal than they are getting.

Another exhibitor stated that at times he becomes so disgusted he is tempted to shut out the pictures and substitute an orchestra, or some other musical attraction. "Why," said he, "I could put in an organ and stand as good chance for holding the people as I have with most of the pictures I am getting. I do not complain so much of the subjects. I am willing to take my chance with the rest of the fellows who are paying the price I pay, but I insist that common sense be exercised and that all of us get a variety. It is surprising to me that the manufacturers of the films are not alive to the situation. If distributors in any other line of business were as indifferent to the wants of the public as so many film exchanges seem to be I am sure they would hear something from the people who want to get their goods before the public. I think this matter should be thoroughly investigated and some relief afforded to the exhibitors. If it is not the business will suffer."

Still another exhibitor voiced the same sentiments and even more severely criticized the management of some exchanges. He bitterly denounced the position taken under the system which leaves the exhibitor completely at the mercy of the man in the film room who hands out the films and declared that when it can be conclusively shown that such people are evidently incompetent or indifferent the head of the exchange should do something towards securing satisfaction for the man who pays his money, but does not get his choice.

In one of the exchanges I visited I told the people in charge of the complaints made. "Oh," said one of the parties, "you have been connected with the business long enough to know that such yarns are as old as the hills. Like the poor, such people are always with us. The exhibitor is the hardest man in the world to satisfy. He expects the latest stuff at the cheapest price and expects us to be mind readers, so that we can keep posted sufficiently to counteract his opposition. We receive certain subjects from manufacturers and have to deal them out to the best advantage in proportion to the different rates the several exhibitors pay. If we do not get enough comedies we cannot supply them. Anyone who knows anything about the business will tell you that the big cry for years has been for more comedy and the manufacturers will tell you that they are constantly offering inducements to scenario writers for them. I believe that more of such pictures are being produced to-day than during any other period in the history of the business, but it seems to be difficult to get within reach of the demand.

Most people like pictures wherein a good story is well told, whether it be dramatic or tragic, but all of them like a good comedy. The exchanges and exhibitors can get more money out of a rattling good comedy than they can out of the best serious subject that can be written. I can name several comic subjects of this character, yet they are by no means plentiful in proportion to other subjects, and no matter how good they are the line is drawn on repetition. It is here the public comes in with their "I saw that before." I tell you this picture game is one of the greatest brain exerts that ever struck the amusement field. We continually keep unfurled the banner bearing the old trade motto: "We strive to please," but everybody tells us it's a joke, no matter how hard we try. I'll admit that every exchange should have a film room man who will look after the interests of the exhibitor in the selection of films and there should be no arbitrary or indifferent exercise of authority in that connection, but I also contend that sometimes the distributors are misunderstood. They are criticized for not allowing every exhibitor to make his selection of films. That is impossible in the present day. If you will restrict this privilege to old subjects it may be possible but the exchanges don't want the live ones. There was a time when exhibitors could ask for and generally get what they wanted, but they were not as numerous nor as particular as they are now. We do not dispute them of that privilege because we wish to give them what we think they should have, or have any desire to be arbitrary. The withdrawal of the privilege has benefitted a great deal of dissatisfaction and saved the exchange much unnecessary worry and vexation.

The complaints on the part of exhibitors regarding operators in the main was directed against a spirit of independence displayed by many of them. I am glad to say that I got into the business I was in good a union man as any that have worked for me and if I was still at the same work my sentiments would be the same, but I do not sanction anyone taking advantage of his employer in any way because of the backing he may be in through his union membership. So far as attention to duty and responsibility to his employer is concerned the union operator's position is in no way altered and the best men by even show his limits for such membership to be the good, be sober and the respect he shows those employing him. There are too many young men who feel they are above the rules because of recent events in the union and regulations and the greatness of business in operators and some of my exhibitors have had some trying experiences with them. While I know that the changes have been productive of good results in many re-

It seems to me I can see in these plays and others like them the search of the many nature manifestations [illegible] the coming picture which will have a widely generic appeal. It is because that audiences like of plays built on one [illegible] and [illegible] dress, others we have had "chase scenes" [illegible] and "magic" ones for amusement, and "Western dramas" for thrills; only we are all quite ready to turn to [illegible] drama and "heart-talk" scenes for relief. We will tire of them, too, and demand new things, and still more new things, and it seems to me that the play which has a genuine educational value will fill some of the demand in the future, even to a greater extent than today. Let us hope, also, that in the future, such educational plays will have less about them to call forth carping criticism than some done (to death) today.

To particularize, there is the play laid in a foreign country in a little known locality. In Biograph's "The New Dress" there is a delightful picture of a Mexican market scene, and the little story adds, to its normal natural prettiness, the delight of first-class photography of a locality little known, in pictures, to the public. One hardly calls the picture educational, but I am sure that I am not the least well informed man who saw that film, and I am quite ready and willing to say that I have a better and clearer conception of peasant life in Mexico after seeing this play than before. And by the way, the whole thing is most excellently done, the only criticism which can justly be made is a medical one. One is bound to say that Biograph handles a delicate matter delicately, but it seems perhaps germane to say that as a general rule, the less a motion picture audience is given opportunity to talk about "before and after" pictures, when the subject is a mother-to-be and has been, the better taste the play can be considered to be in.

Gaumont's "Christian Martyrs" gave a convincing and realistic picture of household life in a patrician household of ancient Rome. The film was well colored, the acting good, and the setting really beautiful. That the identical same plot has been worked over several times before is a pity, for it detracts from the interest of this presentation of it. That Roman, either man or girl, who loves another, who happens to be a Christian, and who with the Christian love of his or her heart suffers martyrdom in the arena, after betrayal, is not a novelty on the screen. But seldom has it been done with such fidelity to detail. One questions the reality of the scene only when the producer crowds a dancer into her audience in space in which no dancer could or would dance, for the sake of a large picture, and when a title informs us that the martyrs are to be sent to the lions, and we later see the hero nailed to a cross instead.

It is very pleasant for the present scribe, who has at times roasted Pathe for this or that, to be able to say all the good things he can think of about those "Paul and Francesca." As I look at my notes, made at the time, for this article, I find "well done" as the marginal comment. There must be hundreds—thousands—who will see this play who never before heard of Francesca da Rimini. Now, the mere knowing of this story won't help us very much in raising the standard of culture of those who see it. But put enough stories from famous legends, poems, books, upon the screen [illegible] set enough plays in foreign scenes—go back often enough to other ages and put a play in faithful and historic costume and scenery, and the result cannot help but be educational and instructive to audiences, who are pleased and amused at the same time. Of course, we know that Francesca and her lover were not run through with a sword while sitting on a divan looking at each other—but we forgive the inaccuracy because we know the reality would not have been tolerated by boards of censorship or Police either. But the rest of the story—the coloring of the film, the really exquisite scenery and the clearness of the whole tale and its freedom from any obscurities, make a result which Pathe should be proud to have produced.

While talking of ancient history, Gaumont's "In Time of Nero" should be mentioned as another fine exposition of ancient Rome—the story, one of poison, intrigue, the sending of a slave with poisoned wine to an enemy, and the stealing of the slave and wine and drinking of the latter by the son of the woman who supplied the poison, the son's death and the woman's grief, give opportunity for some excellent work, not only on the part of the very capable staff which portrays the various characters, but on the part of the producer who staged the whole, and whose success in producing a faithful picture is much to be commended.

Ambrosio has produced a film, the title of which seems somewhat in doubt. One theater had it the "Grenadier Roland"—another called it the burning of Moscow. But whatever its true title, it is certainly a bright and shining mark for other producers to shoot at and hit if they can. They say it cost thirty thousand dollars to produce and employed three thousand men as characters, and it looks the assertion in both cases. I believe they have the best battle scene, bar none, I ever saw on the screen—I found it far too short. As far as the eye could reach into the distance that battle line went—not merely a few cannon and men in front and smoke in the distance, but real men, real cannon, way way off into the horizon.

The retreat was excellently done—that straggling line, winding its way across the snow-covered plain, was very impressive, and the Ambrosio producer—more power to his arm and much credit to his taste and artistic good sense—instead of bumping the audience right up on this letter and letting it take the form of a procession, showed it through the opening in a tent or little shed. The retreat was a background to a scene close to, and fifty times as true and impressive this way as if it had been the main thing placed before your eyes.

There is little to say for this but praise—yet one cannot forbear asking why, oh why that magnificent battlefield, after the battle, with its dead, its silent guns, its moonlight, was made unreal with an unlit lantern which gave no light, used to search for one particular man? That and the snow storm are the two most jarring notes—the snow was a wee bit too big and didn't fall quickly enough to seem like real snow, nor did the snow storm, of big flakes, hide the distance as one expected it would—it was a little too evidently a local storm!

But there is another side to the photoplay, bearing on education, which has nothing to do with locality or history or the portraying of legends of poems or historic events.

The art of acting is one which is dear to us all. The matinée girl's idolatry for the Leading Man and the Bald-Headed Row's passion for the Leading Lady are but symbols of our national love for good drama, for fine acting, for faithful, truthful presentation of emotion on the stage.

There can be little question that the five cent motion picture theater reaches thousands who never go to the "legitimate" theater at all, and millions more whose theatrical taste reaches its height in love for "The Old Homestead," "Two Orphans," or the "White Slave."

No man can listen day after day to good music and not learn to love it, in preference to poor music. And no man can go constantly to a moving picture show and see first-class acting and not learn to appreciate it, and to object to anything less good. Take the veriest dyed-in-the-wool lover of tank melodrama, who never saw a real play in his life—make him attend a motion picture theater daily and see only capable companies doing faithful, honest work, and it would be a good safe bet that the next time he saw a heroine rant or a hero clutch at his vitals and roll his eyes, he would laugh instead of applaud.

The standards of acting on the motion picture stage are still in a formative process. Producers are not agreed even upon the essentials. Thus we have Miss Leonard, of Rebiance, compelled or allowed—I don't know which—to do a lot of talking to the audience—looking directly at the camera and taking the audience into her confidence. I imagine a Vitagraph girl who did it would be fined! The legitimate stage has practically given up the "aside" as an aid to understanding the action, but the motion picture manager still finds it necessary to have some of his actors and actresses do and say things which the audience can see, but which the other actors and actresses before the camera are compelled to remain in ignorance of. Take Pathé's "The Accomplice" as an example. This is a disagreeable, almost nasty story, in which the extremely capable leading lady does some very, very creditable work and gives a thoroughly convincing portrayal of a dancer who undergoes a painful experience. Her lover is in debt. She is to sup with a rival, a wealthy nobleman. He implores her to leave a window open that, apparently, he may rob the nobleman's house. In getting her a present, the nobleman shows her how his safe has a trick lock—trying to open it in the usual way fires a hidden gun and kills the thief—the real way to open it is by pressing a corner. Then he opens a window and leads the way back to the dining room!

The agony of mind of the dancer who must conceal from the nobleman her anxiety, her endeavors to warn her lover without letting the count know what she is doing, her final effort in a really beautiful dance, to distract the count's attention, and her final grief when her lover is shot, were magnificently done.

Now, mark this. The nobleman, who has brought this woman, about whom he is half crazy, to his house, sits in his chair at the supper table and never turns his head to watch her, as she dances, when she dances beyond the angle of his vision! No, sir! He couldn't. The stage manager wouldn't let him! How in thunder could the dancer get time to put her head through the curtains and try to warn her lover if he did turn his head and watch her? But you can be very sure that you and I and anyone else, let alone a man half mad with love for this rather lightly clad girl, would turn heads to watch her dance down the room and back again, unless, as here—there was a stage manager bellowing at us not to do so!

Lubin put out two little dramas recently, both of which had very little to hang criticism upon, and both of which showed that capable acting can hold interest just as well as varied scenery and lots of action. The first one I saw—I think "The Hoyden," in which an actress saves the name and reputation of a society woman of somewhat lax morals, by substituting herself for the society woman at her lover's studio, just in time to confront the angry husband, was so well done all through, by every one of the four principals concerned as to deserve special notice. Prominence made a charming and unconventional actress-cousin, and her byplay of facial expression when the artist laughed, and offered her a glass of wine, and she smiled sweetly at him, took it and flung it so deftly and so gently, full in his face, was very, very well thought out. Miss Elder as the wife used her faculty of restraint in her actions and movements to good effect in all her scenes. It is in "Drifting," however, that Miss Elder gets a part which she fills as if she was poured into it—and if several other leading ladies who have had to play parts of divorced or separated wives, would give this film a glance or two, and learn what real dignity and ease of manner can do with a hard part—and how a woman can show an inward turmoil and unhappiness while keeping a perfectly conventional countenance without crushing to death a perfectly good gown or handkerchief, their future work might show an improvement.

The special mention of these two actresses here must not be taken as any indication that the present scribe has seen no others or liked no others he has seen. Quite the contrary—there is not a large or important producer to-day who has not only one, but several very capable leading men and women—these two were mentioned here because their work seemed so excellent in parts in which they had neither much action nor any special setting to aid them in "getting it across."

AMERICAN BEAUTIES.

This colored film is very pretty, intended to display in colors the varied beauties of a rose garden, it is rapidly approaching perfection. While there are weak features in the film, this page is rather to chronicle advances than otherwise, and this picture must be classed as one in which there is much growth in the art of beautifying the moving picture. The idea is somewhat of a playful nature, depicting several young ladies flitting butterfly-like from one place to another, admiring and plucking the beautiful roses. The whole forms a splendid introduction to another, which we trust will soon appear on a larger and more thorough scale; for its purpose, this present one is very pleasing.

A Moving Picture Charity.

Indianapolis Exhibitors Conducting Their Own Relief Bureau.

A charitable work that is attracting much favorable comment has been conducted by the moving picture theater proprietors of Indianapolis for several months. The funds are derived from the Sunday exhibitions in moving picture theaters and airdomes. Under a State law, only entertainments that are given for the benefit of charity are permitted on Sunday, and the moving picture shows are allowed to run on that day by reason of the fact they are contributing to charity.

The work is carried on under the auspices of the Citizen's Charity Association, organized and incorporated by moving picture theater and airdome proprietors. Officers of the association are: President, John Trulock; vice-president, Joseph H. Gavin; secretary, John A. Victor, and treasurer, Dr. J. M. Rhodes.

Aggregate weekly contributions to the charity association range from $150 to $200 a week, varying according to the weather. Down town houses pay a larger per cent. of their Sunday gross receipts than do the smaller outside houses. About fifty moving picture theaters and airdomes are now contributing to the fund.

It is the association's purpose to conduct charitable work in a field not now covered by other charitable associations. As a part of the work, an emergency home for unfortunates was opened at 717 North New Jersey Street several months ago. This is a house of eight rooms, modern in every detail, where persons who are temporarily in unfortunate circumstances are given relief.

For instance, among the occupants of this emergency home have been a man and wife who have four children. The husband has been seriously ill for several months and his wife has tried to keep the family together by doing family washings. At last, exhausted, she was unable to do anything more. The children were placed in an orphan's home until the mother might recover her strength, and husband and wife have been in the emergency home several weeks.

An aged couple, who are without a home and who are rapidly losing their eye-sight, have been in the home several weeks. They have a horror of the county asylum and have been permitted to remain in the home. A mother who has nine children has been in the home eleven months, some of the children being cared for by friends.

Recently a woman with four children was given shelter in the home until she could be sent to Connersville, where she had obtained a good position and has found a home for herself and children with relatives. The husband and father, a railroad man, ran away, leaving his family penniless. There is one room that is kept strictly for emergency cases. This has two beds and a cot, and is ready for occupancy at any hour of the day or night. The home, however, is only a small part of the work that is being conducted by the association. Through Mrs. Gertrude Oakes, the organization is disbursing thousands of dollars annually. Mrs. Oakes has devoted most of her life to charity, and is matron of the Indianapolis City Dispensary. Mrs. Oakes has full charge of the home and of all relief work.

Mrs. Oakes has kindly furnished The Moving Picture World representative with a statement of the expediture of the organization from June 15, 1910, to May 15, 1911. These expenditures have been as follows: Provisions, $1,649.43; coal, $222.22; rent, $273.45; cash given out, $638.75; clothing, $246.40; medical fares, $84.20; miscellaneous, $94.15.

Very frequently persons are stranded in the city, without money for car fare to be used in reaching friends. In such instances, railroad tickets are furnished free, a work not conducted by any other charitable organization of the city.

It is also sometimes found that a mother may know what her family needs better than the organization, and in such instances she is given money instead of provisions, coal or clothing. Under the head of miscellaneous, meals have been bought for unfortunates. Under this head, fifteen pairs of spectacles have also been purchased, as well as elastic hose and braces for crippled or injured persons who have thus been enabled to undertake some form of work immediately.

Numerous instances have also been found where dying mothers would be able to keep their children together, provided they had some means of paying rent. The organization is paying the rent of several such women. In other cases, widows are being given from $2 to $3 a week for the support of themselves and children.

One of the aims of the organization is to help those who are willing to help themselves. The purpose of the charity given is not to give temporary aid, but to give and assist the recipients are able to get on their feet again and do for them-

Princess Theater—Vancouver, B. C.

One of the finest, if not the finest, moving picture houses on the Pacific Coast has recently been opened in Vancouver, B. C., by Mr. W. F. Dawson, formerly at the Lyric Theater, Baker City, Oregon. Mr. Dawson named the Princess at 50 Hastings Street, East. Since its opening it has been doing a tremendous business. It is situated in the heart of the business district. The front of the building follows in its general design the Renaissance style of architecture. Inside, it is modern in every respect. The auditorium is lighted by hundreds of soffit concealed incandescent bulbs, so arranged that there is no glare, the light being thrown against the ceiling and reflected downward. The picture screen is wide set and placed back of the proscenium arch. The arch is trimmed on the west side by a beautiful decoration in art glass, through which the lights shine softly.

PRINCESS THEATER.

The seating capacity is 450. The seats are divided into three sections by two aisles. The side sections contain four rows to the rear, the center section seven. It is thus possible for a late comer to find a comfortable seat in any part of the house without climbing over more than three people. In arranging the slope of the floor, the architects have kept in mind the line of sight, which is very important to every spectator. The slope of the floor is so arranged that every person in the audience can see over a person in front.

In the operating room, everything is of the latest pattern. Every modern electrical appliance known in the moving picture world is to be found therein. The picture machine is the latest approved Edison pattern.

The comfort of the women and children who attend the theater has been kept in mind. On the right side of the auditorium, at the side of the stage, is a comfortable retiring room, with all modern accessories. Here the tired woman with her children, wearied after an arduous shopping tour, may find rest and relaxation.

The programmes of the Princess are always up-to-date. Mr. Dawson secures the first releases of "Lux" and "Eisson" films, and runs also an assortment of the other independent manufactured pictures. The Princess runs a thousand more feet of films per performance than any other theater in Vancouver.

The orchestra is in charge of Miss Emma Dubie, a violinist who is well known all over Western Canada, and the press work is in charge of E. M. Latimer, a local newspaper man.

To Film Grand Canyon.—Three Arizona men are about to undertake a hazardous journey with a moving picture camera. E. C. Kolb, of Bright Angel Trail, Grand Canyon, Arizona, arrived in Los Angeles recently to make preparations for the trip, which will be begun Sept. 1st. Accompanying Kolb will be his brother, E. C. Kolb, and Reese Trimble. The three plan to traverse the Colorado river from its source to its mouth. The gorges of the Colorado are among the deepest and most treacherous of any river in the world. The party will leave the headwaters of the Greene River, Wyoming, a branch of the Colorado, on Sept. 1st, fully equipped with special canoes, moving picture camera, film, and food supplies. Their trip will cover more than 1,400 miles, most of it through the most magnificent scenery in America. In order to realize the desperate nature of the contemplated trip, it may be mentioned that scores of persons have tried to make the trip, only three or four succeeding in emerging alive from the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, where for 217 miles they will traverse a canyon 2,000 feet in depth, 90 miles of which will be through the granite gorge where the walls are perpendicular, and the river made perilous by reason of the more than five hundred rapids through the canyon. The three men in the past have had many battles with the river, and they expect to make the trip in safety in spite of the many treacherous rapids, the falls, and other dangers disputing their passage.

Red Wing (in private life the wife of Mr. Young Deer, the Pathe director), since her return from New York recently, has been engaged in creating a new leading Indian role in a big Indian production that the Pathe director is putting on this week. Mr. Young Deer is playing opposite to her in the other.

James L. Magee, business manager for the Selig Western Company, who accompanied the second company to Merced last week and made arrangements for their transportation into the Yosemite Valley, has returned to Los Angeles.

Joseph A. Oliver, well known on the legitimate stage throughout the country for the past forty years, has left the legitimate to act before the moving picture camera. Mr. Oliver has joined the Pathe West Coast Stock Company to play character leads.

Biograph Leaves.—The Biograph Company has left for the Eastern studio in New York, after completing a very successful season in California, where they have filmed so many of their notable successes. The best of this season's work, in the writer's opinion, were their films: "Fisher Folk," "The Spanish Gypsy," and "The Days of Forty-nine," each of which brought the company world-wide praise and commendation, the "Spanish Gypsy" leading the race for popularity. The company, however, have some of their biggest films taken this season yet to be released.

EDUCATIONAL.

Without waiting for the ponderous deliberations of the school board, the children of the Outhwaite Public School, Cleveland, Ohio, have been giving a series of entertainments for the purpose of raising money enough to purchase a moving picture machine, which they wish to use principally to supplement their studies in geography. This incident again points out the fact that sometimes the savants will spend weeks speculating on the benefits of something or other, which even a child can see at a glance.

Balancing the Program

By Henry.

The World's New England representative has witnessed so many moving picture shows which were greatly marred because of the lack of judgment displayed in the placing of the reels on the program that he had jotted down this failing on a sheet of paper, as being a common fault, intending to write on the subject. It was the Solax Company's advertisement in the World, dated April 11, that brought this matter to his mind again.

The advertisement in question spoke of a comedy reel about to be released. And, beside the announcement, these magic words were written: "PUT THEM between your DRAMAS." How much better would the majority of moving picture shows be, if the managers had paid attention to that phrase, instead of forcing the advertising department of the Solax Company to hammer the fact home. A program of pictures can be made—and, by the same token, unmade,—by the proper placing of the reels on the program. The World's New England representative has visited certain moving picture theaters with more or less regularity for nearly four years. In all those visits, it has never once been his pleasure to witness a split reel placed in such a position on the program that it would balance the quantity of drama and comedy to the best advantage. For in-tance, a moving picture theater has a program of four reels of pictures, three of which are dramatic, and the remaining one a split reel, containing two comedies. (This ratio of drama to comedy reels is very common, by the way.) The chances are about one hundred to one that the theater will run the three dramatic reels together, tagging both comedies on either the beginning or the end of the show. It is easily evident that the show would be more enjoyable if the split reel had been "split" by the operator or the manager; and if the two comedies had been exhibited, one at the starting and one at the ending of the program, the audience, having had its laugh, is more ready to settle down to the drama which would follow. Vice versa, after the serious drama, the house would appreciate the comedy to a greater extent. In the end, we would be more likely to find the audience feeling that somehow or other—the show was good. They would be more apt to like it so than they would had they first been satiated with drama and then given to comedies, in quick succession.

I agree that it is easier for the manager to hand his operator the titles of the reels to be exhibited, just as they happen to come in, and to direct him to run the reels in order in which he has written them down. We also agree that the same is a poor policy. There is many a moving picture program that is run on the hill in the order that the film exchange happens to jot down the subjects to be given the theater.

Imagine it, Exhibitors, the balancing of the picture program left to chance by whom the exchange man happens to hand the exhibitor the titles of his program. The World's New England representative has often seen the list as handed the exhibitor by his exchange placed in operating booths as the schedule by which to run the picture program. The audience at the moving picture theater knows when the show is "right," and also when it is "wrong." They do not attempt to analyze the why—that's the manager's business—they simply are aware of the facts themselves and do not trouble to arrive at their causes, immediate or remote. If they did, however, many, many times the immediate cause wherefore the show did not altogether arrive, would be found to be merely poor balancing of the program; that the bill had been slung together, as we may be pardoned that phrase, without head or tail. The time consumed by the manager in "doping" out the best position to place his reels, in order to present a well-balanced show, would be amply repaid by the results. One wonders why these split reels are not "split" in half by the theater, and the two subjects placed to the best possible advantage on the bill. Only two reasons can be found for the omission, and, frankly speaking, they are carelessness on the part of the manager, or stupidity on the part of the same gentleman. Take your choice, as no other reasons will properly fill the bill. Witness a moving picture show presenting two or three reels of drama in succession, followed by a split reel, consisting either of two comedies or one comedy and one educational or scenic reel (as the majority of manufacturers make them), and then view the bill same show with the reels well balanced, and notice the difference in the two performances. The difference is considerable, the means of transforming the poor presentation into the better offering requires only a few minutes of study by the manager, and a moment or two for the operator to cut off the split reel in two parts. And presto, things are more "as they should be!" The World's New England representative begs to bring this matter before the attention of all exhibitors reading the World; and urges them to consider the matter and to place the idea into operation, as the results are very well worth the small amount of trouble involved.

Good Entertainment.

By Speck Tater.

There were two men sitting behind me at the 14th Street Theater and they discussed with each other the play moving on the screen. It was one of the best plays of the week, but the two made it even better. The play—it was "For Her Brother's Sake" (Imp)—had been preceded by a picture which neither I nor they had understood. This picture was clear at every step, yet not trite, for it gave a chance for several arguments, as you will see. The shadow-being of Mr. Spotwood was thrown on the screen. If I had met this man in New York City, I should have said he was from Kentucky and that he owned a stock farm. He seemed troubled and had a letter in his hand which showed that a mortgage was due.

"The place is mortgaged," said the man behind me. "Yep," said his friend.

Here was something different, viz: a strong situation, at once clear as day. Presently Spotwood's wife came in the picture and the two discussed ways and means. Then the son and the daughter came in. Money was got out and the young scion of the Spotwoods was sent to pay the holder of the mortgage. Then we saw young Spotwood and another man at a table in a pleasure pavilion.

"That man's a runner for a gambling house," said one of the men behind me. Spotwood showed the money, but put it back in his pocket and shook his head.

"He isn't going to fall for it," said the other.

I wasn't so sure, for the youth seemed attracted by his companion's invitation. The next scene was around a roulette table.

"He's going to loose it all," said one. "No he ain't he's going to double it," said the other.

He played once and failed.

"Now he's in a fix," was the remark behind me.

"He's going to try it again," said the other.

"He's a fool," was the next remark.

"No he won't, he'll double it this time, sure." was the reply. He lost again and wrote his I. O. U.

"Gosh, he owes $2,000," was the comment.

The young man had to own up to his father. It wasn't a pleasant job, but he got through with it. Then we saw him beside the stable. A very beautiful horse looked out of a window.

"They're going to lose that horse," remarked the man behind me breathlessly and with a connoisseur's regret. The sister came and without condoning her brother's fault tried to comfort him. A man, passing, tacked up a poster advertising $20,000 in prizes in a coming series of races. When this was seen by the girl and the audience, the satisfaction behind me said, "The horse is going to pay off the mortgage in a race." Then the villain appeared and made love to the girl who repulsed him.

The next scene is in the home. With wonderful acting that made a very human picture, the girl persuaded the holder of the mortgage to wait for a few days. Then she and her brother went to engage a jockey. The men behind me approved of their choice of a jockey. The speed of the horse was then taken by a stop-watch, and it proved satisfactory.

"He's a winner," said the enthusiastic one behind me. Just then the dark villain came tip-toeing up behind the boy and girl.

"Here comes that feller again" They can't fool him. Hiss 'em," said the other man. It was true and plain that the villain was up to evil tricks.

"He's going to drug the horse" said one as the man in the other watched, but made no reply. It was now the house that the villain dropped, but the jockey, and it was too late to get another. The brother and sister were in despair; then the sister seemed to see some way out.

Quick as a wink the enthusiastic spectator exclaimed joyfully. "She's going to ride him herself!" She did, and came in an easy winner and had her hands full of big denomination bank notes which she joyfully put into large smell. The brother promised never to gamble again. The play was fully told and it ended at the right point. The men behind me were delighted and so was the whole house.

JUAREZ MEXICO, AFTER THE SIEGE.

Brief mention was made in these pages last week of a topographic zone to be issued by the Mutual Company on June 20th, depicting the principal scenes of the war of the latest Mexican revolution. As it is, by the accident of the time that a city has been photographed while a moving picture camera immediately after a siege, the edition should be of considerable historical value. It presents views showing that the film is of excellent photographic quality and the photographers have selected such scenes as give a very clear idea of the damage done to the buildings by the bombardment. Some interesting side lights on Mexican customs also serve to make the film instructive as well as interesting. An excellent close up view is given of Red Lopez, an insurrecto leader, who has since been sentenced to eight years imprisonment.

BEHIND THE SCREEN PROJECTION IN LIGHTED THEATERS.

In another part of this issue of the Moving Picture World is an advertisement of the Light Motion Picture Company, of Monessen, Pa., inviting moving picture show proprietors to correspond with them for the purpose of learning all about the "Light" system, as it has been patented by this company. A theater is operated at 6014 Pennsylvania Avenue, Pittsburg, Pa. where many prominent people interested in the moving picture business have called to see the invention demonstrated. Thomas McWatters, the inventor, is president of the company.

The writer visited this theater recently and was surprised at the remarkable difference in details of pictures as shown in a lighted room and in the usual darkened theater. One of the pictures was Selig's "Thelma," and there were some beautiful pieces of acting in this piece which I am sure would have been lost by the dark process. The ideals of film manufactures and artistic stage-folks are certainly to be reached by the use of the "Light" system. Here is every change of expression, every glance, every picture of emotion clearly portrayed. I also saw a Biograph, entitled "The Chief's Daughter," and "In and Around Cuba," all of them entrancingly produced on the glass screen which is part of this system of light motion pictures.

The screen used in the theater where the invention is being demonstrated is 11 x 13 feet. It is solid plate glass and is covered with a composition wherein lies the clearness of details in the pictures. The projecting machine is in the rear about twenty feet from the screen. It is thus seen that by this process the audience does not share in the odors and noises common to many theaters, and that the prejudices of a few timid people regarding a possible disturbance in the machine booth with a resultant fire blocking the entrance are at once removed. It has always been my belief that the greater the mystery and strangeness thrown about moving pictures, the more attractive they will continue to be to the public, and I remember the first time I saw a machine in operation I was considerably disenchanted. The Light Motion Picture Company has its system protected by patents. The company will not sell the system to any theater outright, but will install the same on the terms of a lease. An unlimited field is also opened up to advertisers and demonstrators of various kinds, owing to the fact that by the "Light" process, pictures can be projected out-doors, in the full light of day, without in the least affecting the details of the pictures, but, on the contrary heightening them.

COWBOY PICTURES.

The romantic West of the early days lives mainly in story and song. The big ranches of the West are now being cut up into small farms. The farmer has come, and come to stay. Gone are the buffalo, the Indian warwhoop, the free grass of the open plain. Save in some of the secluded valleys of southern New Mexico and California, the maverick steer and the regal longhorn have been supplanted by their more profitable Durham and Herford cousins from across the seas.

In the secluded valleys of Southern California the last of the fast vanishing type of American cowboy sits his horse easily, riding through the wide valley enclosed by mountains, with his face turned steadily down the long, long, road —"The road that the sun goes down." That the cowboy was brave has come to be axiomatic. If his life of seclusion made him taciturn, it, at the same time created a spirit of hospitality, primitive and hearty. To the cowboy, more than to gold seekers and more than to Uncle Sam's soldiers, is due the conquest of the West. Along his winding cattle trails the forty-niners found their way to California. The American Film Manufacturing Company, with their producers and expert camera men are still doing excellent work recording into film classics the romantic stories of the West amid the original scenery and backgrounds of the Range Country.

The work of Mr. George E. Periolat, the character man of the "Flying A" Western Company, in the film entitled "The Hermit's Gold," which will be released June 22nd, is worthy of note. His characterization of the morose and taciturn "Hermit of the Hills" at the start of the film, and of the hermit's insanity near its close, is a remarkable piece of work in every way. Mr. Periolat is allowed to use a great deal of his own discretion in his make-up; the producer simply informing him as to his requirements for the particular picture to be produced. Mr. Periolat's ability in this connection is well evidenced by his striking appearance in the aforementioned film. "The Hermit's Gold," by the way, undoubtedly will prove to be extremely popular with the exhibitors, as it has been declared to be one of the most thrilling dramas ever produced in the West.

The Vitagraph Company will release four reels of pictures per week, beginning June 28th. This will be no extra tax upon their facilities as the company has been turning out four reels per week for some time and have about six months' negatives ahead. The first picture of the new release will be a splendid allegorical picture which in its conception and execution is said to transcend anything yet done in motion pictures. We have just been advised that the negative has been completed to their satisfaction and we will promise our exhibiting friends a description of the picture in next week's issue.

One of the four Vitagraph releases, beginning with July, will be a Western reel, made in the most picturesque section of the West—the vicinity of the Grand Canyon. It is intended to make this series a portrayal of actual Western life and conditions and not imaginary episodes of the dime-novel order.

The General Film Company offices have been removed from No. 10 Fifth Avenue to the Fifth Avenue Building, at the corner of 23d Street and Fifth Avenue.

An interesting competition is being waged in a certain place in Greater New York between two places where "giving the people what they want" for five cents is the motto of one exhibitor, against giving the people "what they ought to have," and charging them ten cents besides, is the motto of the other exhibitor. This latter, according to the ways of the world, is at a great disadvantage, but the writer believes that at the end of a trial of one month he will win out.

A Reply From Manila.

Manila, Philippine Islands, April 28, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir: If not asking too much I would request space in your esteemed columns as an answer to the letter signed by Mr. E. J. C. in your issue of March 18, 1911. I sincerely deplore a construction which would divert the tenor of my letter, as published in your issue of February 4th, to such an extent as to class it as a mere complaint, still worse do I deplore the fact that it should have been taken advantage of by Mr. E. J. C. to vent his spleen against some person or persons in Manila with whom he has had apparently very unsatisfactory business relations. I do not wish to be considered controversial, but I cannot, you permitting, allow his letter to go unanswered.

In the first place his business relations with Manila exhibitors had nothing to do whatever with the stand I took in my article, but I will take it upon myself, aside from the personal intimations in his letter, to answer him in detail.

If he has been renting films as low as $12.50 or $15 per reel, he was certainly letting them go very cheaply. His giving trust was upon his own responsibility and showed business methods equally as cheap. The exhibitor to whom he refers must have been exceedingly well favored. There are three others here who rent films from the United States and I am absolutely certain that two of them rent films from firms who receive payment for these films upon presentation of shipping papers to their brokers or bankers. A representative of one of the latter two made a contract with an exchange which promised him films not later than six months released and agreed to pay the price asked. The films received were as stated in my former letter of the most "veritable junk." Let me quote part of the contract for the information of Mr. E. J. C.: "Said films shall average about 500 feet in length and at least 80 per cent. of the films shall be of American origin; the remaining 20 per cent. of the films made up of European or other origin at the option of the said first party, but all films shall be known as fresh releases—that is, up to date." Now Mr. E. J. C., there are two sides to every story. I had no idea that a representative of an exchange in the United States would care to go into the details of such matters, but the question is opened, I will take to state that the shipment to which I referred in my letter as being "the worst junk that was ever handed to anybody," came from the firm in Chicago which drew up and signed this contract. The price paid to this firm was exactly what they asked, with the understanding that the exhibitor would get "late releases—that is, up to date" films, something from what I actually know. The junk that this firm passed out to the exhibitor to whom I refer was such as I referred to in my former letter, in spite of the fact that they set their own terms and got paid immediately upon presentation of the shipping papers to the brokers of the exhibitor.

Your correspondent states: "I wonder what they would do if they paid the price that is paid in the United States." I would like your correspondent to know that we have paid as high as 18 cents, United States currency, per foot for special European releases purchased because they could not be rented. They are paying a higher price, a good deal, than United States exchanges and some of the renters are paying 50 per cent. more than Chicago exchanges. Mr. E. J. C., these are facts; you must have gotten off wrong, and your article not written from your knowledge of the question, but from the result of a personal grievance.

Mr. E. J. C. states that an exhibitor here gets seven times the amount of his rental by sub renting. Listen! There are at present in the Philippine Islands not more than 60 cinematographs, 30 of which are now in the city of Manila. We have now in the city of Manila dealing in films an agent for the Pathe Freres, an agent for other European makes from the head office in Barcelona; a sub-agent, or rather, purchaser for the Gaumont product; we have a sub agency for miscellaneous makes from Hong Kong; we have a sub agency for Independent goods from Vancouver, B. C.; we have a firm here handling stuff purchased by a man who is traveling back and forth between the United States and Europe; we have four firms here renting films from the United States. The first six control, by ownership or otherwise, 45 theaters; the other 15 theaters are controlled by the four renters. To make myself a little clearer, I want to state that the purchasers in the class of the first six named are doing most of the business, so I don't very well see where any of those renters or even the purchasers can soon be manufacturers.

In the last paragraph of his letter, your correspondent has advanced an argument which kills whatever he has stated before and is a staunch supporter to what I maintained in my letter published in your issue of February 4th. I don't have to read the Moving Picture World to know that Manila is not the "only place" receiving junk. I realize most fully that the stuff we have received here must long ago have been shown in a "junk" form before it reached this city. As stated in the beginning of this letter, I deplore the fact that your correspondent should have used my letter as a lever to present to the public a personal grievance against some exhibitor in this city. I have been forced to show these facts in a personal way in order to substantiate my previous statements, but I would have preferred that Mr. E. J. C. had looked upon my letter not as a complaint against either the exchanges or the manufacturers, but as a plain statement of facts which would sooner or later have to be remedied or the United States lose the Oriental trade.

Yours faithfully,

J. J. ROBINSON.

Sensational Pictures

May 15, 1911

Editor Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir: When are the manufacturers going to listen to reason and stop exciting the press, the clergy and the public by producing highly sensational pictures? Certain manufacturers are growing so bold that they stop at nothing to please their own morbid instincts or a few of the rabble, while they disgust the better element and drive away from the shows that section of the public who have any religious sentiment left.

For a long time, I have wanted to protest against the highly sensational productions of the Reliance Company and warn the exchanges that while such pictures as it turns out may satisfy the gallery, yet they offend the general public. The climax came when the Reliance film, "The Conflict," was run in my house on Sunday, May 14th. So many people protested and left in disgust that I have told my exchange not to send me any more of that make.

The story of the film, if it can be called a story, is this: We are shown a dance in progress in a private hall or a disorderly house. The settings would give the impression that is it at a private residence, while the short ballet skirts and music hall manners would suggest that it was a can-can in the café of a concert hall. A woman is offended when she finds her lover making love to another girl and in despair she runs to a convent. The man runs after her and changes the woman's mind by offering her some roses, so she returns to worldly pleasures. The priest wishes to save the woman and interferes. There is a quarrel. The villain slaps the face of the woman. What American audience will stand for such an outrage? But the worst is yet to come. The man insults the priest and hits him, then he takes a crucifix from the priest's hand and smashes it on the floor. At this, a cry of indignation went up from the audience, and many left their seats and protested at being expected to pay money to look upon such disgraceful scenes.

Have we a National Board of Censorship? If so, who are they who pass upon such offensive orgies? Are they pious Methodists who, while they condemn other pictures, pass this one that will get a slap at their Catholic brethren? We live in a free country, where the constitution bars no religion, and a National Board of Censorship should consider it a part of their duty to see that the religious sentiment of any part of the community is duly respected.

I hope you will print this letter, but without my name, for business reasons. I admire The World for its consistent fight it is making for better pictures, and trust that you will keep up the good work.

Yours respectfully,

[M S. Manager

[This is one of three written protests we have received against this film. It is very evident that the exhibitors do not want pictures which drive any part of their audiences away, and it is not the first time that we have received letters of complaint against the method or suggestive pictures of this and other companies. Only this week an Essanay picture, "The Temptress," was ordered off the screen in the New York police. We learn that the Board of Censorship had disapproved certain scenes, but their suggestions were unheeded. This is no doubt the case with all pictures that receive public censure. We have an efficient and experienced Board of Censorship. While their word is not law it would be well for inexperienced and aspiring producers to conform to their ideals, else why such a board at all?—Ed. M P W.]

Mutt and Jeff in Moving Pictures

First Appearance of the Conversational Reel.

"What is the use" to go out of doors by this time, but we are obliged to ask it all the same by way of greeting for Mutt and Jeff who in the merry month of June are enter Moving Pictureville and that of comic means a holiday in the land of the movies.

It looks as though the Nestor Film Company has the one best bet of the season in the forthcoming series of Mutt and Jeff. We have had the privilege of seeing this week the first of the Mutt and Jeff series, the account of which is hereinafter set forth. David Horsely has landed a big fish this time, as there are few cartoon characters more popular than these two bizarre creatures of the brain of "Bud" Fisher.

The Nestor Company has not only secured the exclusive rights for the production of Mutt and Jeff in pictures, but have also secured the services of "Bud" Fisher himself to personally direct the staging of this series, and anyone who has any inkling of what Mr. Fisher's services are worth will readily realize that the Nestor people are not stopping at expense in getting out this series. The picture we saw was the first one of the series, and while very well put together and acted, we have no doubt that succeeding efforts will be great improvements over the first few releases. To render grotesque, fictitious characters into human life is by no means an easy task, especially such characters as Mutt and Jeff.

It took a long time to find the proper men to play these two parts as they should be played. These having been found, one of the greatest obstacles in the way of the Mutt and Jeff idea was removed. It remained then to stage the first of the series, which has been done extremely well, considering the enormous difficulties of a first release. It will take time, perhaps, for all the characters working in this series to become thoroughly at home in their parts, and the series cannot help but improve as time goes on and more subjects are added. It is the intention of the Nestor Company to give to the trade a Mutt and Jeff reel every Saturday, for a strong comedy feature. We can see the time not far distant when Mutt and Jeff will be the craze at the picture house on Saturday night.

Considered with the production of Mutt and Jeff, the Nestor Company has put over a new idea in the way of a conversational reel. Those of our readers who follow the Mutt and Jeff series in the New York American and other papers are accustomed to reading conversations between Mutt and Jeff, which is in box form with the drawings, and many are no doubt wondering how it is possible to reproduce the conversation which goes on between Mutt and Jeff. This phase of the situation is taken care of in a way that will be astonishing to the entire film trade. Mr. Horsely has been at work for some time upon a new invention which will record conversation between characters in a moving picture film. This has been perfected in time to use with this latest series.

and patents have already been applied for. It is a unique and practical idea, which we are not at present free to divulge. But we can say with certainty that before the year is out the idea will be adapted by all film makers as a necessity, and Mr. Horsely should derive a wonderful revenue in the way of royalty on his idea.

The first Mutt and Jeff reel has been completed. The reader should not expect as much from the first one, however, as from the second and third. In our opinion, the characters other than Mutt and Jeff in the first reel are rather too serious for the matter in hand, being plain everyday folks, as it were, instead of being a trifle grotesque in the same manner as Mutt and Jeff. With succeeding numbers of the series, the other characters in the pictures will be along the line of the grotesque, and thus conserve the general idea of cartoon comedy. The settings and background may be a little more on the fantastic order to carry out the general idea of "dippiness" which pervades the work of "Bud" Fisher.

We do not know the names of the principal characters, but they played their parts perfectly; in fact, so well that in the first picture they leave all other characters very far behind, a little too far, we should say. But that is an easy matter to fix. The first reel is funny enough for the start of what will no doubt prove to be the greatest series of comedy pictures that has ever been attempted.

Extract from a Brooklyn letter: "Would you kindly give me a list of names of the most commonly used songs of other countries, patriotic and otherwise, and tell me where I can procure the same."

Now, this question has been put to me a great many times, and I have always responded with a list compiled from various collections. I do not know of any one work which contains them all, however. Last week I mentioned a little book of Carl Fischer's which is as good as any and has the added attraction of being inexpensive. For the benefit of future enquirers, I shall give a list of desirable National Airs of this and other countries:

AMERICA.—"Star Spangled Banner," "Red, White and Blue," "Yankee Doodle," "America" (identical with the British "God Save the King").

SOUTHERN SONGS.—"Old Kentucky Home," "Carry Me Back to Ole Virginny," "Massa's in the Cold, Cold Ground," "Suanee River," "Dixie," and "Bonnie Blue Flag" (the last being contemporary with the Civil War. "Marching Through Georgia" being a Northern tune of that period).

CANADA.—"The Maple Leaf Forever," "Vive la Canadienne."

ENGLAND.—"Rule Brittania," "God Save the King," "Roast Beef of Old England," "Tommy Atkins."

IRELAND.—"The Harp That Once," "Kathleen Mavourneen," "Come Back to Erin," "The Minstrel Boy," "Rory O'Moore," "Patricks Day."

"Boyne Waters," "Croppy, Lie Down," "White Cockade" are party tunes, of the time of William of Orange; anti-Catholic or "Orange tunes."

SCOTLAND.—"Bonnie Dundee," "Within a Mile of Edinburgh Town," "Blue Bells of Scotland," "Auld Robin Grey," "Kinloch of Kinloch."

WALES.—"Men of Harlech."

NORWAY.—"Ja Vi Elsker Detta Landet," "Astri, Mi Astri," "The Challet Girls' Sunday" (by Ole Bull).

SWEDEN.—"Ur Svenska Hjertans," "Jenta O Ja," "Djupt i Halvet," "I Rosens Doft."

FINLAND.—"Bjorneborg's March," "Suomi Song."

DENMARK.—"King Christian," "Denmark by Whose Verdant Strand," "A Soldier Brave" (German-Danish War).

RUSSIA.—"God Save the Czar," "Say'st Thou" (old ballad), "The Cossack Dance" (by Bendix), "Russian Suite" (by Gruenwald).

GERMANY.—"Die Wacht am Rhein," "How Can I Leave Thee," "Was Ist des Deutscher Vaterland?" (Emil Ascher publishes a very complete list of German popular and folk-songs.)

HOLLAND.—"Wien Nierlansch," "Flanders," "The Merry Maidens."

POLAND.—"Poland's Not Yet Dead in Slavery," "Mazeruk," "Polish National Anthem."

LITHUANIA.—"To the Lark."

AUSTRIA.—"God Preserve Our Noble Emperor," "Oh! Thou, My Austria."

HUNGARY.—"Swear Hungarian by Thy Country" (Hungarian Fantasies and Czardas as found in all catalogs will also apply).

ITALY.—"Garibaldi's Hymn," "The Tri-colored Banner," "The Volunteers Farewell" (Many popular songs of the present day have been written around the Italian character, and often these can be used to advantage.)

GREECE.—"Sons of Greece, Come Arise," "National Air."

SPAIN.—"Hymn de Riego," "Quien Quisiera la Libre" (also Spanish waltzes such as "Santiago," "Espana," etc. Selections can frequently be made from "Carmen" for some pictures. The "Habanera" figure will apply to Spanish as well as to Cuban and Mexican pictures).

PORTUGAL.—"Hymn de Acclamation." (A new one is composed with the coronation of each king.)

FRANCE.—"Marsellaise," "Partant pour la Syrie," "Mourir pour la Patrie."

MEXICO.—National air, "Mexicanos, al Grito de Guerra," "La Paloma," "Manzanello," "On the Mesa Grande," "Panquita."

EGYPT.—"Egyptian Love Dance," "Zallah," "Aida March" (from the opera), "Egyptian March" (Puerner).

ORIENTAL.—"In a Pagoda," "The Prince of India," "Oriental Dance," "Vision of Salome" (Lampe), "Hindoo Priest's Incantation" (Bendix), "Pasha's Dream," "In the Soudan."

CHINA.—"Chinese Serenade" (Puerner), "Ping-ling," "China-town March."

I have so frequently given titles of numbers suitable for American Indian scenes that it is unnecessary to repeat them here. The numbers mentioned above are composed largely of genuine national airs, with the exception of the last three, which are characteristic numbers of the three countries named. The real music of China, Egypt and the Orient in general is not as a rule practical for this work. I have omitted the South American states and many of the smaller countries, as the music of these is rarely called for. In fact, it is only on occasion that many of them are needed at all—but, like the fellow with the gun, "when you do want it, you want it bad." I have selected these titles from six or seven different books and catalogs. It must not be understood that they comprise everything in that line, or even the best of their kind. They are merely intended to be representative, are all good and will give an idea to those who "want to know" what to get as a starter. Many good collections are on the market and your music dealer can undoubtedly procure them for you. I especially recommend that the reader supply himself with the Oriental, Chinese and Egyptian numbers, as they are constanly in demand.

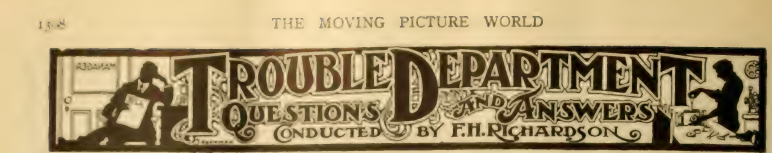
Another thing I have been questioned about recently is "popular songs." The inquiry has come from illustrated singers in picture theaters and has been in the shape of a request for new music. Now, I have never regarded this department as including this kind of work, though it might legitimately be made to do so. In the cases referred to I have sent addresses of music publishers to the inquiring parties and let it go at that. I may possibly add a "song department" to this page, though I am not making any rash promises. If I find it will be of sufficient interest to my readers, as well as feasible for myself, I will develop something in that line also.

THE NEW KINEMACOLOR COMPANY.

We enjoyed a visit this week to the new offices of the Kinemacolor Company of America, situated in the newly erected office building at 145 West 45th St., and were shown through the entire plant by Mr. A. H. Sawyer, corresponding secretary for the new company. Within the next month or so the set space leased by this company have been laid out as a general office, executive offices, demonstrating and exhibiting room with a specially prepared concrete floor to serve as a substantial foundation for the projecting machine to be installed shortly for the exhibition of Kinemacolor. The entire rear end of the floor is to be devoted to the setting up and repairing of machines that will in the future project pictures in their natural colors.

Not wishing to be unduly urgent but at the same time very desirable of obtaining what information we could regarding the policy to be followed by this company, in order to keep our readers posted, we were informed that it was the intention of the directors to start their regular releases some time in September comprising recently received American and European subjects of Kinemacolor and black and white prints, and, being favored with unlimited capital, are going to open and operate Independent exchanges and theaters, in the event of their not being able to market their pictures through the existing channels.

With such men as Mr. John L. Murdock as general manager, and Mr. Arthur H. Sawyer, secretary at the head of the new company we can perceive no reason for anything but success for this enterprise. Later and full details of the above company will appear in the columns of this paper.



QUESTIONS ON LAST WEEK'S LESSON.

1—Describe Bouguer's Photometer.

2—Describe Bunsen's Photometer.

3—What principle do all photometers depend?

4—Describe, in your own language, the action of a photometer.

5—How would you proceed to measure the C P of your projection arc lamp?

6—In your judgment, would a standard candle or a standardized incandescent globe be the best standard by which to measure projection light, and why?

The Velocity of Light is computed at about 186,000 miles per second, though figures by various authorities vary slightly. The speed of light has been measured in several ways. Up to a comparatively short time ago (the year 1656) light was not considered as having "speed." It was supposed to move throughout the universe instantaneously. The speed of light is so enormous (about 8¼ minutes from sun to earth) that it may only be measured by extraordinary methods, some of which I shall describe.

In the year 1656, Roemer discovered the fact that light travels with a definite, measurable speed. This discovery was first made in the following manner: Jupiter has satellites or moons which move around that planet in definite orbits just exactly as does our own moon. As these moons, or, taking one as an example, as one of these moons moves around the planet Jupiter it is eclipsed, disappearing from the view of an observer on the earth, at regular, stated intervals. The exact time required for the satellite to complete the circle of its orbit is known, therefore the period of eclipse has been accurately determined, being 48 hours, 28 minutes and 35 seconds.

In Fig. 12 is seen the earth in two positions of its orbit. It will readily be seen from the drawing that as the planets follow their orbits the earth will not remain at all times the same distance from Jupiter but will be closer to that planet at a certain time of the year by a difference of the diameter of the earth's orbit. Roemer's discovery was that at different periods of the year there was a difference of the time of eclipse of the Jupiterian satellites amounting to a maximum of [illegible] minutes. In other words, he found that, taking the time of the satellite's eclipse when the earth was closest to Jupiter as the standard, as the earth receded the eclipse came gradually a little later each time until the earth was farthest removed from Jupiter, when it amounted to a total of [illegible] minutes. As the earth again advanced on its orbit, the time of eclipse of the satellite gradually became nearer normal, until at the closest point it again reached the standard of a year previous.

The diameter of the earth's orbit is about 184,000,000 miles, and by reasoning Roemer concluded the difference in eclipse time was due the period required by light to travel the increased distance. The simple problem thus became 184,000,000 divided by [illegible], which gave the velocity of light as [illegible] miles per second. Naturally, however, this method was subject to error to some extent, since measuring interplanetary spaces so enormous cannot be done with conclusive accuracy. Since that time, the results obtained by Roemer have been checked up by other methods and corrected.

One method of correction, or calculation, used depended on what is known as the aberration of the stars, or the aberration of light.

It may be on a swiftly moving railway train on a perfectly still day when rain is falling absolutely vertical, the drops will not appear to fall thus, but obliquely toward the rear.

In the sketch, at X and X' represent the path of a drop of water falling vertically, and Y and Y' the eye of an observer seated at the window of a swiftly moving railway coach. When X is at position shown Y is considerably behind it, the arrow showing direction Y is moving. As Y moves forward to position of Y', X falls to position of X', the two movements producing to the eye the impression of the angle shown by dotted line, acuteness of the angle being dependent upon relative speed of X and Y. This corresponds to aberration of light. To further illustrate: Suppose in B, Fig. 13, the ball 1 to be falling vertically, its path represented by dotted line 1, 2. It enters the slanting tube 3, which is moving rapidly in the horizontal direction indicated by arrow. Now if the tube moves from 3 to 4 exactly in the time required by the ball to fall from 1 to 2, it is evident that the descent of the ball will be in no manner affected. It is evident, however, that were the tube held vertical and be moving, the ball could not pass through it and still move straight down. In other words, if the tube is moved it must be inclined just enough to counterbalance the movement of the ball, else the ball will be interfered with.

This principle has been applied to the telescope. It is found that in order that light travel down a long telescope tube, the tube must be pointed not at the star, but at a slight angle to its true position. Knowing the orbit speed of the earth and the angle of the tube to the true star position the light velocity may be and has been calculated. But this method, like that of Roemer, depends upon precise knowledge of the earth's orbit dimension and the earth's speed, which are not known with very great accuracy, hence these methods are unsatisfactory in some degree.

They have, however, been checked up and corrected by mechanical methods, one of which, Fizeau's method, is as follows:

A toothed wheel was constructed containing 720 teeth and, of course, 720 spaces between; 8,663 meters away was a mirror accurately reflecting a ray of light, so that it practically doubled back on its own path. A ray of light was passed through the space between two of the teeth on the periphery of the wheel, caught on the mirror and reflected back to the eye of an observer stationed at and looking through one of the spaces in the wheel. Now if the wheel be rotated at a given uniform speed certain definite results will be attained. It takes the light a certain, given time to travel from the wheel to the mirror and back, in this experiment, a distance of 17,326 meters. In 1/720 of a revolution of the wheel each of the 720 teeth of the wheel will occupy relatively the space just filled by the tooth immediately ahead of it. It therefore follows that in half that time each tooth will be moved ahead into the position previously occupied by a space between the teeth.

Now the observer will see the reflected ray as a bright speck in the mirror. It is therefore possible to so adjust the wheel speed that a tooth will move into the place just occupied by a space in precisely the time taken for the light to travel the 17,326 meters, in which case the bright speck will disappear. This Fizeau found to occur when the wheel speed was 12.6 revolutions per minute, each turn thus occupied 1 divided by 12.6 seconds and the teeth and spaces changed positions as often as 1 divided by 12.6 x 2 x 270, which figures out as 1 divided by 18,144 of a second. In other words, the result showed the light speed to be 17,326 x 18,144 meters per second, or, reduced to miles, it would be 17,326 x 18,144 x 39,368 divided by 12 divided by 5,280 per second. Later experiments (Cornu, 1876), with better appliance (of the same sort) reduced this to 300,400,000 meters per second, or about 186,000 miles, as shown by astronomical measurements. If the wheel were turned at a certain increased speed the light ray again appeared, but this time through the second space and when the speed of the wheel was trebled above the first test the light was again eclipsed, being caught on the second tooth and so on, thus proving the correctness of its operation.

Summing up results of different measurements we find that light appears to travel 187,500 miles per second. But, I think I hear you say, "what has all this to do with operating?" Directly, nothing whatever. The operator has to do with, and very much to do with, radiant energy (light), however, and the more he knows about it and its action the better. In fact, for the best results it is imperative that the operator have a comprehensive knowledge of light action, and it is to supply just that knowledge that these articles have been undertaken. The operator who patiently follows these lessons through and studies them well, arriving at a comprehensive knowledge of the meaning of the various phenomena set forth and described as we proceed, will be the gainer from any and every point of view. I might add that the lessons have but barely commenced. That is to say, taking 100 as the whole, they have progressed to about 12.

A Bundle of Questions.—New York City propounds the following:

"(1) Won't a 104-volt incandescent lamp burn brighter on 110 than on 104 volts. Is there any likelihood of the lamp burning out?

"(2) When pulling 45 amperes on No. 8 lead, the wire will get hot and of course there is a loss of current. Will a No. 4 wire cause a greater flow of current than the standard rheostat is calculated to supply?

"(3) Does the Board of Underwriters allow rheostats to be used in multiple in the city of New York, provided the wiring be heavy enough? I wish to pull about 50 amperes.

"(4) When a rheostat is stamped 25 amperes, does it deliver that current after it is hot, or is there a drop of a couple of amperes due to carbon, resistance, bad contacts, etc.?

"(5) Is it allowable in New York City for one night stand shows to use stage cable from mains, or must one have BX?

"(6) Do they allow the use of rheostats in series on 220 volts in New York?

"(7) When called upon to give a show in a church supplied with A. C. current and my 25 amperes rheostat does not supply sufficient current to give good curtain illumination, am I allowed to cut out some coils, or what can I do?

"(8) Do they allow the use of choke coils or rheostats on A. C.?

"(9) I project a 16¾ foot picture, and sometimes the screen is gray instead of white, due to the manager attempting to make a daylight curtain of it. Am using A. C. Miles Bros. rheostat, 50 amperes, 110 volts, 125 cycle, and the light through it is pretty fair, though it should be better. Can I raise the amperage by cutting out some of the wire winding and grid plates? Do you think it is safe to try this, or could I hook up a Powers 15 ampere rheostat in multiple with the other rheostat? If you will give me good, clear answers to these questions, I will promise not to trouble you again for a very long time."

Answering questions is part of the work of this department, and you are entitled to ask just as many questions as you wish, no matter if it be every week. As to your questions:

(1) Certainly, a 104-volt lamp will burn brighter on 110 volts, but will not last very long on that pressure. It probably would not burn out immediately, but its life would be very greatly shortened by using it on 110 volts.

(2) The rheostat you name is calculated to deliver a certain rated amperage with only a normal line resistance. If you use a No. 8 wire, pulling 45 amperes, and the wire gets hot, adding the high wire resistance due to heat to that of the rheostat, the effort is to reduce the current below the normal amperage of the rheostat. The No. 4 would have very slight resistance when carrying but 45 amperes and your rheostat would therefore deliver its normal capacity, whatever that may be.

(3) The Board of Underwriters have, so far as I know, no rules against using rheostats in multiple in New York or anywhere else, always providing the wiring and connections are properly made, according to their rules governing such matters. The Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity of the City of New York is the body which forbids the use of rheostats in multiple, and the prohibition of the Department is absolute.

(4) Twenty-five ampere rheostats are calculated to deliver their normal capacity when hot. After they have been in use a few days or weeks, however, it will be found that their actual delivery has decreased to anywhere between 18 to 22 amperes, instead of 25.

(5) I believe stage cable is permissible under the conditions you name. I would advise you, however, to call up the chief inspector of the borough in which you are located, and get his approval.

(6) Yes.

(7) Cutting out of coils is absolutely forbidden in New York City. You may, however, first securing the Department's approval, use a rheostat up to 45 amperes capacity.

(8) Yes.

(9) Not in New York City.

Travel Ghost.—Galva, Ill., writes: "Can you tell me what is the cause of the grinding noise in my Powers No. 6? I also wish to know how I can take the travel ghost out of my picture. I am certain it is a travel ghost, because there are light streaks on all titles. My throw is 70 feet. I also wish to know which carbons are best—½ and ⅝, or both ⅝? How may I tell the size of my condensers when the numbers are not on the box? I do not know whether those I have are 7½ or 6½."

Your information is too indefinite, Galva, as regards the grinding in your machine. I would suggest, however, that you make sure that the sliding way holding the small toggle gear, which is just behind the flywheel, is tight enough so that the gear does not wobble; also that the upright sliding way which holds the gear is not loose on the small cross bar at the bottom. Sometimes a grinding noise will develop in the gears of a machine and it is rather difficult to determine the exact cause even with the machine in front of one. The toggle gear being loose is the most likely source of the annoying gear grumble. The travel ghost is caused by the shutter being a trifle out of time. It is evidenced by the streaks up and down from the letters in the titles, or by the white flashes up and down from any white object in the picture. Be sure that the screw in the inner hub which fits into the groove in the shutter spindle is set down tight in the groove, so that the shutter has no play. Be sure also that the two collars on either side of the shutter spindle boxes set up tight against the housing, just so there is no play when them without causing the shaft to bind. If the trouble is still present, loosen one of the screws which holds the outer shutter hub to the inner. Then loosen the other just enough so that the shutter may be revolved, when the flywheel is held stationary, by the use of a little pressure. Put a film in the machine and, holding the flywheel stationary, slip the shutter a little one way or the other and try it. If the travel ghost has disappeared, tighten up the screws and the job is done. If, on the other hand, it is worse, then you should move the shutter in the other direction and keep slipping it until you get it exactly right, that is to say, until the travel ghost has disappeared. If the flashes are down at top of the shutter should be pulled towards you. If the flashes are up from the letters of the title then shove toward the top of the shutter away from you. If you are using direct current you will find that a 13 cored carbon above and ⅝ inch solid below will give the best general results. Do not, however, try to use hard carbons such as are used in the street lamps. I have given this advice in several instances and had the neighbor write back that he could not get good light at all with the ⅝ inch carbon below. Investigation, however, showed that he had borrowed some ½ inch carbons from the local light company for a trial. Such carbons are very hard and not at all the proper thing. A somewhat lower ⅝ inch solid carbon must be a projection carbon and not too hard. If you have the Handbook you will find directions for measuring condenser lenses on page 87. Briefly, it is as follows: Put a white sheet of paper against the wall opposite a window away from the window some 8 or 10 feet at least, or a sheet of paper pinned on a wall 6 or 8 feet from an incandescent globe will do. Hold the lens up, flat side towards the sheet, and move it back and forth until the picture of the window or the incandescent light is sharply focused on the sheet of paper. Measure the distance from the wall to the flat side of the condenser, then add about half the thickness of the lens and you will have a pretty close approximation of the focal length of the lens. This is a trifle different from the handbook rule, and those having handbooks should note the correction on margin of page 60. One thing I forgot to mention, and that is that with the Powers No. 6 your shutter should be set just as close to the lens as you can get it. Setting it away from the lens any distance will tend to produce travel ghost. Also be sure that you get under the wide [illegible] swing and not one of the narrow ones at either side.

Remodeling Lamp and Lamp House.—Mr. J. C. Kilburn, Eureka, Cal., writes: "You asked for illustration of lamp and lamp house. I therefore enclose [illegible]

A tinner will make the lamp and lamp house complete for about $10, cost to an operator is any work on it he can do himself. The worst job is lengthening the [illegible] To lengthen the new arm, braze in the piece in metal. I cut new gear rods for mine, and it is not [illegible] if you can get the use of a shaper. Of course, it was how to file the teeth, then that is something else again." The remodeled lamp is certainly an improvement. With the old style I could only run three or four reels with one setting of the carbons, but this one is good for 10 reels at the very least. I changed my shutter from the inside to the outside, as I said, and find the outside shutter to be much the best. I simply lengthened the shutter shaft and put a bearing out on the end. If any brother operators are having trouble installing outside shutter, just let them write to me direct and I will explain the matter. Mine has been running for three or four months and I have never had a bit of trouble."

The neighbor's address is Mr. J. C. Kilburn, Star Theater, Eureka, Cal., should any of the readers desire to correspond with him. There is no doubt but what any practical arrangement allowing the use of longer carbons is a distinct improvement—one that I have long advocated. A lamp house ought to be built in such a way that a 14-inch carbon could be used above and at least a 6-inch below. Aside from the item of expense, there is no reason why this cannot be done, and it certainly ought to be. The saving of carbon would, in course of a year, be very large (see page 83, Handbook).

An Interesting Letter.—Mr. John Cooper, Manager Sterling Economizer Company, Warren, Ohio, who recently returned from an extended visit to England, writes: "As agreed with you personally, I will now try to set down on paper some of the impressions I received as regards moving picture theaters of England. In England they have no store shows such as we have here. That is to say, there may be some, but, if so, I neither saw nor heard of them. All photoplays are either installed in regular theaters or buildings specially put up for the purpose. They call them picture palaces. The smallest one I saw would seat 600 people. They all have graded prices for seats. In the smaller towns the prices run from threepence (6 cents) for about the first ten or twelve rows; sixpence (12 cents) for the next ten or twelve rows back, and the remainder of the seats from sevenpence (14 cents) up to a shilling (24 cents). The peculiarity in this arrangement is that the farther you get away from the curtain the higher price of the seat. In London the prices run all the way from sixpence up to four shillings. In some places they have vaudeville and pictures, and others nothing but pictures. Every show has what they call 'early doors,' which means that if they advertise that the doors will open at 7 p. m., they will in reality open them at 6:30 p. m., charging an extra price up to 7 p. m. For the sixpence seats they will charge ninepence and in the same proportion for all other seats, or about half as much again as the regular price for the 'early doors' and most of them get filled up at 'early door' prices. It is very wonderful how patiently the English people will wait for an hour or more for the doors to open. They do not crowd around the doors as we do here in America, but get off the edge of the sidewalk in single file. I have seen more than 200 people thus ranged in a long line waiting for the 'early doors,' and woe to the man or woman having the nerve to try to get ahead of his or her turn.

"The English seem to enjoy the pictures more than we do here in America. At least they show their appreciation or disapproval of them very openly. If a picture pleases they will applaud just as we do in the regular theaters when we see our favorite actor or actress. I think this is as it should be. It makes the operator and the manager feel good when they hear the audience applauding. They know that their patrons are pleased. Conversely, when they do not applaud they know that they are not pleased. It also furnishes an excellent guide in making up programs. In America the only way one can find out whether or not the audience like a given picture is by asking the patrons the question directly as they are leaving the house, or at some other time. In England they like the American pictures very much. I have known them to applaud as soon as the title has been thrown on the screen, both for the Biograph and the Vitagraph pictures. In all the places I visited I did not see any picture shows open all day as we have them here. Invariably the rule is to give two shows each evening and a matinee on Saturday. Most places are not allowed to open on Sunday. In London, however, they nearly all open that day, but in order to be allowed to do so they are obliged to give all they make over their expenses to some hospital or free institution. You can always tell who they are giving the surplus to by the large placard in front. I saw some very good projection, but none better than we have right here in our own little town of Warren, Ohio. (By the way, if you should ever get over our way, I want you to stop in and see our picture shows. I think we can produce something very fair in the way of projection.) In England they are great for high voltage and high amperage. They use as high as 80 and 90 amperes, with 70 volts at the arc, but I have gotten just as good light with 50 amperes, 35 volts at the arc A. C. In one house I visited they were using 80 amperes, 70 volts at the arc D. C., and the light was no better than in our own picture shows in Warren, which latter are using 60 cycle A. C., 45 to 50 amperes, 35 volts at the arc. This man was using 11/16ths inch carbon below and ⅝ above. He had a lamp just like the one you described a few months ago and it certainly was a monster. It must have weighed at least 30 pounds (I mean the lamp alone, not including the lamp house). The prospect for the future of moving pictures in England appears to be excellent. In the county of Durham, where I visited, is the town of Shotten, a colliery village of 2,000 population, which supports a picture palace seating 600 people, fills full the first show and half full the last show (only two shows a night being given). On Saturday nights they turn people away. There were other places of equal population from which I had report, and they all seemed to offer about the same support to picture plays as did Shotten. However, I visited quite a number of cities such as London, Manchester, Liverpool, Sunderland and New Castle on Tyne, and everywhere I went the photoplay business was good. As I before remarked, I did not, however, see any store shows and I believe if some enterprising individual who understands the business well were to open a good store show in any of the large towns of England he would make money."

On behalf of the readers of the department, Friend Cooper, I thank you for your very interesting letter. Comments on my part would be useless, as I know very little about the things of which you write. One thing, however, I wish to call particular attention to and that is the fact that Friend Cooper says the higher priced seats are those farthest from the stage. That is common sense. In the photoplay theater the farther you get from the screen the better the show is—not sometimes, but always. I might add that with some it at its best when you are clear out on the sidewalk.

Another from Boston.—Boston, Mass., writes: "I see you are in doubt as to whether my scheme is practical or not. Or, at least, you question its working satisfactorily. Well, all I can say is that it has given entire satisfaction and that I have had no trouble whatever with it in the past year. The rheostat was sold to me for a 25 ampere, 110 volt instrument, to gauge Krupp resistance. It was very plain to me after getting out seven coils and using 20 amperes I had just seven coils I would never use, so I separated them from the remaining five and put the other five in another series with the other lamp, leaving me just two coils to spare. In testing with the ammeter, the reading shows 20 amperes for each lamp, or 40 amperes together on the dissolver. I know this is rather heavy current to use on a dissolver, but the size of the picture warrants it, so there you are."

The proposition you put up, Boston, is an electrical impossibility, provided the rheostat is a 25 ampere, 110 volt instrument. If you divide the coils of that kind of a rheostat, cutting one-half of them in series with each lamp, you would halve your resistance, and instead of getting 20 amperes, you would get nearer 40 until the coils burned up. It, therefore, follows that while the rheostat in question may have been sold you for 110 volt, 25 ampere instrument, it was not one by any manner of means, probably being a 220 volt rheostat. I assume, of course, you are working on 110 volts pressure.

Shutter Troubles.—Sheldon, Iowa, writes: "Enclosed find $1.50 for the Handbook. I have just installed a Powers six machine and am having some trouble adjusting the shutter. I am not satisfied with a fairly good picture. I want the best. Am using A. C., 110 volt, 60 cycle current and have an excellent light. I have a three-wing and a two-wing shutter. Although I have only run the machine two nights, I have tried both shutters, and as near as I can judge from the operating room, there is less flicker and not quite so much light with the three-wing shutter. I find, however, that on the titles and sub-titles there is more travel ghost than with the two-wing. I presume the Handbook gives instructions for shutter setting on all machines. Will you kindly give me your opinion as to which shutter to use and how to set it?"

You are absolutely correct in saying that the three-wing shutter gives less light and less flicker than does the two-wing. My own preference is the three-wing shutter, however. On page 129 of the Handbook you will find directions for setting the No. 6 shutter. It sometimes occurs, however, that a lens of such exceedingly wide angle is used where one throws a large picture on a very short throw, that a special shutter is necessary; that is to say, a shutter having a wider blade than the regular article. If your lens is of less than 2½ inches back focus it may be necessary to have one of these special shutters sent you. If your lens is 2½ inches or more back focus, then there is no such necessity. See also answer to "travel ghost" in another place.

Curtain Coating.—California (name of town suppressed by request) writes: "I have noticed a number of formulas in the 'World' for coating curtains and will submit the one I have used, and which, for a cloth curtain, I do not think can be beaten. A gentleman who claimed to have owned and operated a picture theater in Chicago using a mirror screen said that it was the closest thing to a mirror screen he had ever seen and that his first impression was that it was one. In fact, his first words when he came in the house were a query as to when we put in a mirror screen. We used a heavy grade of sheeting and treated it to a coat of glue size, first stretching it over a frame made of 2 x 6 studding. After it was thoroughly stretched we gave it a coat of white lead mixed as per your instruction in the Handbook and followed that with a coat of shellac. After this had thoroughly set we repeated the process, but this time before applying the shellac we pounced the entire surface with cotton, thereby removing all brush marks and producing a surface which is not perfectly smooth. The last coat of shellac keeps the surface from being scratched by particles of dust and the curtain can be easily kept in A-1 shape. I submit this formula for what it is worth and believe that anyone using it will have an aluminum curtain backed off the boards. I am getting a great deal of good out of the 'World' and also out of the Handbook. I do not claim to be a first-class operator, but so far have been able to show an absolutely clear picture. Any number of people have said we have the clearest and best pictures in town. I have my troubles the same as the rest, but so far have managed to pull through. I am not throwing any bouquets at myself, but I credit The World for what success I have had."

We are obliged to you for the curtain coating formula. No doubt it will be tried out by some of our readers. Glad to know that the "World" and Handbook have been of benefit to you and trust that they may be of yet greater service in the future.

Sacramento Letter.—From Sacramento, Cal., comes the following: "Find enclosed $1.50 for the Motion Picture Handbook. If I receive as much benefit from the book as I have from the 'World' I shall certainly be well satisfied with the investment. Sacramento's population is 44,969. In 1905 the census gave us 29,864, which shows a gain of 14,832 in five years, or an average of 3,000 a year. Sacramento has eight motion picture houses and four theaters, all employing union help. 'The Truth about the North Pole' is being shown in the Lyric, one of our moving picture houses, this week. A special lecturer has been employed for the occasion. The only way of thinking, the pictures at the Lyric are the best in this city. For a long time I could not understand how their operator gave such good projection, but I have discovered the secret. I was passing their house and looking up into the operator's window I saw about ten 'Moving Picture Worlds' lying on the table. The excellence of projection at the Lyric ceased to be a mystery right then and there."

The Handbook has been forwarded you, Sacramento, and no doubt by now is in your possession. There is no question but what the operator who studies projection and all matters pertaining thereto, other things being equal, produces the best work. While the mere fact of "Moving Picture Worlds" being in the operating room would not necessarily signify much, still if the Lyric operator is studying and has studied it, he cannot help but have learned a great deal, since during the past year the ideas, views, opinions and schemes of operators and managers all over the world have been given publicity. While, as I said, the presence of "Worlds" in the Lyric operating room would not necessarily prove the operator to be a student, still it is an indication that he is, and the fact that he is giving the best projection in Sacramento still further indicates the Lyric operator to be a man who has acquired a comprehensive knowledge of his business.

Concave Lens.—From Chicago during the past week has come a request for instructions as to how to make a concave lens 5 inches in diameter. I am not a lens manufacturer and do not know much about the process of making concave or any other kind of lenses. However, for your benefit, after considerable hunting, I have dug up the following by Mr. Alfred R. J. F. Hassard, published in the Scientific American. The direction is for a 4½-inch reflector of 4 feet focus. However, you can proportionately increase the measurements given. Whether you could by this method grind a lens of very short focal length is, I believe, doubtful.

First secure a piece of plate glass 4½ inches by 9 inches. Cut this in two, so as to make two 4½-inch squares. With a glass cutter draw a 4½-inch circle on each square with a few scorings of the cutter into the glass in various places outside of the circle. With a pair of suitable pliers, the surplus glass can be broken off without much trouble, leaving two circles of glass 4½ inches in diameter. The edges can then be smoothed up on a coarse grindstone. Next, cement one of the circles of glass to the corner of a workbench and to the other circle cement a large cotton spool or similar piece of wood; a three-inch section of an ordinary 1½-inch curtain pole will do. The cement used is common black, hard pitch. On the surface of the disc of glass cemented to the bench lay half a teaspoon of sand, emery or carborundum, if either of the latter two use grade one. Wet slightly and rub one glass on the other by keeping the motion crosswise across the lower glass, so that the upper glass crosses the circumference of the lower glass about 3 inches back and forth. Keep moving around the bench and keep revolving the upper glass by the handle, so that never twice will the two glasses cross each other in the same direction. Through the irregular movement comes the regular figure. In a minute or two fresh grit will be needed and by half an hour it will be found that the upper glass is slightly concave while the lower one has become convex, and this process may be continued until the desired degree of convexity or concavity is attained. The focus of the lens may be tested at any time during the process in the usual way that any lens is tested. When the desired convexity or concavity is reached, procure finer sand, carborundum or emery and grind with it, only using shorter strokes. Continue using the finer sand, emery or carborundum until all the small holes in the glass have disappeared and the surface becomes quite smooth. Next pour 1 pound of "flour" of emery into about two quarts of water, stirring it thoroughly for a few minutes after which let it set for 20 seconds. Carefully and quickly pour off all the water and it will be found that only the coarser or heavier emery will be left. Keep this by itself in a small jar or bottle and label it No. 1. Stir up the water which was poured off for a minute or two and allow the mixture to stand one minute. Pour off the liquid quickly and carefully as above and mark the emery left in the bottom No. 2. Continue this process, only allowing the liquid to rest after the second time as follows: three minutes, seven minutes, 30 minutes, and one hour. In this way the last emery will be of the finest possible character and the liquid will be of a pale color. The last emery will be labeled "No. 6." Grind the glasses about 10 minutes with each grade, beginning with No. 1, and by the time No. 6 is used the surface of the glass should be very fine and without hole or scratch, and should not be the case return to the coarser grade of emery until the holes are removed. When No. 6 is reached the glass will be almost transparent. Now on top of the glass cemented to the bench pour some melted black pitch, wet the upper glass and press it on the pitch, so that the surface of the pitch will take an impression of the face of the upper glass or, if it is the convex lens you wish to finish, just reverse this, cementing the other one to the bench instead. Trim away the pitch where it is larger than the glass. Procure one ounce of jeweler's rouge (also known as red oxide of iron), lay a small quantity of it on the pitch, wet it and revolve the upper glass on it diligently. An hour of this will bring the surface of the upper glass to a polished condition and a further treatment will smooth the glass completely.

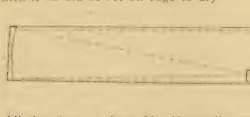
It might also be suggested, that having made such a lens as this you are well on the road towards the construction of what is known as a reflecting telescope. For to support your lens a mount must be devised as above described from a tin can. Having finished its polishing, it must be washed in a bath of acetone and will make it chemically clean; sixty grains of ammonia and potash, four ounces of water, five drops of sulphuric acid will do the trick. Having cleaned your lens in this bath, you may then silver its surface as follows. Take 40 grains of nitrate of silver dissolved in two ounces of water. Pour this into ammonia until at first thickens and then becomes almost, but not quite, clear again. If it becomes entirely clear again, add a few grains more of nitrate of silver. Next dissolve 25 grains of Rochelle's pure salts, potash in stock form in two ounces of water. Mix this with the nitrate of silver, water and ammonia. All will turn black. Next add slowly drop by drop ammonia and the solution will begin to clear. All the while stir it with a piece of wood or glass rod. Next add a small solution of nitrate of silver and water, 10 grains nitrate and one tablespoonful of water, until the liquid, which was nearly clear, begins to get a little darker or ruddy, when it should be laid aside and labeled Solution A. Mix "Solution B" as follows: Six ounces pure water distilled, one teaspoonful of white sugar, one teaspoonful pure alcohol and three or four drops of nitric acid. This solution becomes better as it grows older. Label this "Solution B." Next to "Solution A" add three teaspoonfuls of "Solution B," putting it in a saucer and stirring rapidly for half a minute. Then immerse the glass lens, concave side down, so that that side of the glass is fully immersed in the liquid. In a few minutes the silver will be seen rising and adhering to the glass, and in about ten minutes the glass will be fully covered, when it may be withdrawn. Cold water should then be allowed to run on the smooth face of the glass for a few minutes, after which it should be set on edge to dry.



All the above is from Mr. Hassard's article, though considerably reduced in length. If while silvering your lens you also silver on one side a small piece of flat plate glass, say a piece two by two inches, you then have all the lenses necessary for a reflecting telescope. By using five-inch stove pipe, two or more joints riveted together so as to make the proper length, your silvered concave lens filling one end and the two lenses supported in such manner as to produce the effect seen in the cut, the small square lens being set at an angle of 45 degrees with the other, so as to throw the light out through a hole in the pipe, you then have a complete reflecting telescope, which will give you, if the lens is truly made, surprisingly good results. The small square lens, however, must of course be set at exactly the focal point of the concave lens, which ought to be about 4 feet away. Also the large lens must be so set as to focus on the small one, which will be set quite close to one side of the pipe.

Good Management.—Recently the writer journeyed, via Hudson Tubes, to the wilds of Hoboken and Jersey City, intent on a visit to Keith & Proctor's Jersey City House, of which Mr. W. C. Hughes is manager. Mr. Hughes asked me to criticise the projection, by operator James F. Cripps, but for once he was stumped. There was nothing to criticise. The illumination was brilliant, even and well handled, while the scene of speed showed care and good judgment on Mr. Cripps's part. Mr. Hughes then showed me over the house, and truly it was a surprise. Indeed, it was wonderful when one considers the audience, a good'y portion of which is anything but high class, the necessary low expense account and the 10c and twenty cent admission and heavy film and number bills. The house has a main floor, balcony and gallery, and from basement to the highest seat it is clean as the proverbial new pin; moreover, it is one of the most charmingly decorated theatres we have viewed in a long time, the scheme being a soft, warm red to match the mahogany finish woodwork. The cleanliness is not of the offensive kind and while unobtrusive, it is there and it is everywhere. A vacuum cleaning plant is installed and Mr. Hughes is enthusiastic in its praise. Men's and women's toilet rooms, lounging and smoking rooms (the latter not existing in houses of rumor) are on each floor. Even the stage hands have their lounging and smoking room. The stage is absolutely a model of order. Below it are lockers and rooms for ushers, scrub women, etc, as well as storerooms, sign-painter's room, etc. Just how Manager Hughes has accomplished the wonders displayed, under the conditions, is to me a mystery. He most certainly is entitled to much credit. Much more might be said concerning this house, but space forbids.

Exhibitors' League of Milwaukee

Under date of April 21st, Milwaukee Exhibitors called a special meeting of all local theater managers and discussed the advisability of forming a Welfare League to improve conditions and promote the general welfare of picture shows. The first regular meeting was held at Plankinton Hotel and every theater was represented. The following officers were elected for the term of one year:

OFFICERS.

John R. Freuler, president.
Henry N. Klein, vice-president.
Benj. N. Judell, secretary.
Thomas Saxe, treasurer.
Nic. Heyer, sergeant-at-arms.
Charles H. Phillips, counsel.

Among the matters of vital importance, the advisability of lighting up theaters during performances was discussed and recommended; also to place older men at theater doors, as ticket takers.

Another important measure that was brought up and unanimously accepted was the abuse of passing children in free when accompanied by parents or otherwise. A neat uniform printed sign to be placed in the box office window of each theater was decided upon, reading as follows:

"Only Children in Arms Not Occupying Seats
Will Be Admitted Free
By Order of
Exhibitors' League of Milwaukee"

Wonderful results have so far been accomplished, and a feeling of harmony, heretofore unknown, now exists among the local exhibitors. "WATCH MILWAUKEE."

Chicago Exhibitors' Association Meeting

Moving Pictures Exhibitors Association (or Chicago Exhibitors consolidated) of Chicago and Cook County had their fourth meeting at the Great Northern Hotel, Monday, May 22. Officers elected: George Henry, Grand Theater, president; C. A. Anderson, Hermosa Theater, vice-president; William J. Sweeney, Standard Theater, treasurer; S. Katz, Illinois Theater, financial secretary; J. Bell, Bell Theater, recording sec.

Executive committee: J. A. Alcock, Edna Theater; G. F. Hesch, Principal Theater; F. O. Nielsen, Kimble Theater; A. Natkin, Ideal Theater; George Otman, Lincoln Theater; H. L. Wallack, Ellis Theater; R. C. Valentine, Magnolia Theater.

Auditive committee: C. C. Wheelen, Washington Theater; H. A. Hill, Arrow Theater; A. Carey, Myrtle Theater.

This organization is for the benefit of exhibitors in general—Licensed or Independent. With the officers elected, the organization feels confident of having a successful representative body to guard and protect their mutual interests.

A special committee has been appointed to investigate the sentiment of the City Counsel in regard to the building ordinance passed and about to be enforced June 1, with the purpose of trying to modify this ordinance and secure an extension of time for its enforcement.

The next regular meeting will be Monday, June 5, at the Great Northern Hotel for the benefit of those exhibitors that have not yet joined the organization. The initiation fee is only $1.00, but after this meeting, charter will be closed and the (initiation) fee raised to $5.00.

CHECKING ROOM IN MOVING PICTURE HOUSES.

The checking of babies at five-cent theaters is the latest sensation in Chicago. This checking system has been established so that the weary mother may be able to sit quietly in a moving picture parlor and observe the pictures without being bothered by her child, also that the spectators will not have to tolerate its vocal gymnastics. Many proprietors on the north side have tried this scheme and proved it a great success, to both manager and mother. Perhaps a checking room for women's hats would be also an excellent plan.

"A Good Turn" (Lubin).—The good turn is done by two burglars to a despondent man who is about to commit suicide. If he kills himself, they will be accused of murder, and two policemen are sitting on the steps of the house smoking, so they bind him and call up his sweetheart, getting her name from the man's "last" letter. If told in good English prose, this story wouldn't be out of place in several of the monthly magazines; but such an incident is not of a very virile quality. It is perfectly clear and will be acceptable, for the acting of Mr. Johnson as the despondent man and Miss Lawrence as the heroine, is good. Such stories can hardly be counted as important.

"Joe and Jim" (Selig).—There is no extended dramatic action in this picture; it is merely a narrative of a close friendship between two fishermen, and illustrates the poem, "Joe and Jim," by Hal Reid, something as slides illustrate a song. Of course, after the Selig Company has released such films as "The Herders," with its pictorial beauty and its sincere acting, and "The Still Alarm," with its virile action and other qualities, this film cannot be said to come up to Selig standard. It doesn't come up to it in any department.

"The Carrier Pigeon" (Kalem).—We are given in this film a novelty in Western pictures: A carrier pigeon is used to inform friends that a man is in danger from a band of Indians. Then follows a furious ride, and both these features pleased the audience. Applause followed the pigeon's flight and applause followed Molley's organization of a posse to succor the endangered man.

"The Heart of an Indian Maid" (Pathe).—Here is told the story of a trapper adopted into an Indian tribe by the ceremony of the intermingling of blood, and is given the chief's daughter, Winonah, for a wife. Later he escapes and goes back to his own wife and child. Winonah follows to get revenge, but is befriended by the wife of the man she sought to kill, and when she sees him playing with his daughter, love triumphs and she leaves them in peace. The feature of the picture is the conflict between jealousy and hatred and love in the Indian woman's mind. The ceremony of adoption is accurately reproduced and gives an interesting glimpse of Indian customs.

"The Immortal Alamo" (Melies).—Here is given a historical drama which will take rank immediately with the important educational films. While it possesses all the movement and interest of a war picture, it tells the story of the defense and fall of the Alamo in such a realistic manner that whoever sees it will be impressed with that heroic defense. To see an entire garrison annihilated, only three children and two women being taken, emphasizes a historical event as nothing else outside of the original contest could do. It is the story of Gen. Santa Ana's attack upon the Alamo on Feb. 23, 1836, and shows how the defenders with 140 men held out until the cannon made a breach in the walls and the few remaining were overwhelmed. The negatives were made on the spot, and the Melies players were assisted by students of the Peacock Military College. Such famous characters as Col. William Bowie, Col. William B. Travis, the commander of the American forces, David Crockett, and others whose names live in Texas history, are introduced. It is a very thrilling and altogether satisfactory reproduction of an important historical episode. The company deserves the highest commendation for the picture and the way it is produced.

"The White Rose of the Wilds" (Biograph).—There's a white rose growing near the window of this story's mountain cabin, but the heroine who lives there with her brother and sister is "The White Rose of the Wild." This Rose (the Biograph Company does not publish the names of its players) makes a very good heroine for such a story. Up to a certain point the climax reaches that of Moody's "The Great Divide." It was changed to fit this different heroine, who doesn't barter herself for protection to the strangest of three men who attack her, but by her innocence after he has disposed of the other two roughs, she vanquishes him, and he promises to leave her. He has no chance to show this though, for at that moment he is captured, and the rose saves his life. The story of the film is well constructed and the producer has used a great deal of art in making its tense moments effective. The acting of "The Rose" in particular is natural and very pleasing. The chief rough seemed to be very much a gentleman, but the story wouldn't stand realism in his acting. The other parts were fairly well acted. Among films of the week, this will find an honorable place.

"Hearts and Flags" (Edison).—This is a war story in part like "Shenandoah." There are some fine scenes in it. The one where the Union soldiers first appear and crowd on the porch is very good. The drinking scene in the hall immediately after and the attack on the girls when the heroine shoots two of them and the captain enters with his men and saves the girls is theatrical. The captain's acting, except in the fainting scene, is convincing, that of the girls is even better; and the darkies are fine. It is good to see again that letter that the captain's mother put in the "housewife" she gave him, which said "the needle is mightier than the sword." This story is not so important as some that the Edison Company has put out, but it will be acceptable.

"Semiramis" (Pathe).—This is another gorgeous Pathe production, with stately scenes before temple gates, in the sumptuous palace rooms and hanging gardens of Babylon. We see processions of graceful youths and maidens in silk and gold, a royal marriage, the death agony of a monarch, and the triumphal reception of a victorious queen. Its last scene pictures the destruction of Babylon. The picture will excite enthusiasm by its rich coloring, its magnificent settings, and its stirring scenes with horses and helmets and the waving of plucked palm branches. The producers evidently spared neither pains nor expense in making this picture.

"Tim Mahoney, the Scab" (Vitagraph).—In such pictures as this is the best hope of the photoplay business. It is very distinctively an important picture. The story is of today; is truthfully produced; and is of an interest so wide and deep that it is bound to make a great impression. The acting is sincere. In the scenes in Tim Mahoney's kitchen there is no discordant note. Tim perfectly pictures his peculiar difficulty, while his wife shows as clearly how the situation gnaws her. The children also are distinctly Tim's children. Good as these scenes are, the others adequately support them, particularly the scene at the gates when after the strike the men are going back to work. Tim's position is very poignantly pictured in that scene. It's the sincerity of the picture that this reviewer most commends. It may cause discussion, for it shows what made Tim become a scab. After he dies they put his name back on the books of the union.

"Tangled Lives" (Kalem).—This is another of the Kalem Company's Florida pictures in which the Seminole Indians raid a white settler's cabin. The fight at the cabin is tense. The grandmother saves the baby by jumping with her into the well, and is rescued by a chance taker by another Indian. The picture seems to show what the baby girl's brother is killed, so it is a surprise to the audience to discover that the young man who appears later and makes love to the girl is the same. It might have made a better picture if we had known and expected this climax—less suspense. It certainly would have been more dramatic. The girl leaves the cabin in the swamp to seek her true lover, the man who rescued her from the well. It's a romantic story, not a picture of life, and as such is not important, but it is well acted and interesting.

"Alone at Night" (Cummings).—This is a picture that has much beauty. The autumn of the field with its snow takes part on the old and neglected servant are natural. But he is not an American boy and it is hard to realize whether his "getting" is good or not. The story is long enough while and the slow pace is pleasing. It will touch the kindest feelings in men for it pictures the petty wrongs that worthy people often suffer in this world.

"Jimsey, the Peacemaker" (Gaumont).—This is a pleasant comedy-drama of a boy and girl and a cat and dog who enjoy [illegible] immensely [illegible] they are fortunate in the possession of a mother who is the best thing for all the world like a peacemaker to restore the lost earth child.

"All for Money" (Pathe).—The story of this film is very trite. [illegible] as the letter forged to deceive a lover who [illegible] scenes are in the same category as an interesting [illegible] story, and a commonplace production. There's a scene in the picture where three men are planning to kill their fortune and the sharp knife is held upon these men are the girl's guardian, his son, and the head of an [illegible] scenes these actors were intelligent enough to see this scene a smile produced. It is to be wondered that an intelligent company as the foreign Pathe could put out such scenes as this. One would think that such pieces would [illegible] everybody, but such is not the fact. This kind of play excites a good many people.

"The Lucky Card" (Essanay).—Here is a Western picture filled with thrills and showing in a realistic way scenes which were common enough years ago. The story turns upon the fact that an American saves the life of a Mexican prospector. A year later, when the American has mortally offended a Mexican in a low saloon hall, he is kidnapped and about to be assassinated, when one of the murderers recognizes his rescuer and frees him. The interest is not so much in the story as in the typical background. In this respect, at least, it is one of the best films of this type the Essanay people have released.

"A Novel Experiment" (Selig).—A story such as this should be convincing, for, aside from the main idea, it presents nothing [illegible] very exciting. A successful novelist might very well woo and marry a girl and keep her in ignorance that he was famous till after the ceremony, particularly the kind of man who impersonates tramps to get realism. Perhaps the reason why this story doesn't, in its early scenes, convince us that, except the novelist, its characters and then place in the story are very obscure. The novelist's tramp's costume is good enough; but it is not until Arnold proposes to Smith, the novelist, whom he thinks is a tramp, that he woo and marry Eleanor, do we pick him out from all the others as having a special part in the story. Even then this reviewer wasn't sure just why he wanted to be revenged on her. From that point on the story is clear enough. Yet, girls like Eleanor don't marry men they know so little about. If the climax doesn't wholly convince us, it is well worked out. The idea behind this picture is novel to this reviewer though many plays, old and new, have approached it.

"Love Proves Stronger Than Duty" (Pathe).—An American film of some six months ago told a story very like this in general outline. That is no great drawback for the story is a good one; and, while the former was more exciting, this is much more convincing. The right and wrong of the case is one much discussed and within a year the action of a Southern sheriff who arrested one whom he loved occasioned more than one editorial. In this story a French policeman lets a man who is "pulled" for theft go because he has rescued his only son from drowning. The drowning episode was [illegible] very skilfully. We remember that in the American story the sheriff pushed the duty before the man go on his way. In this case the man restores the money, and the policeman bids him "God speed."

"Bob's Microscope" (Pathe).—This is an educational film full of good instruction, though not a good advertisement for [illegible] but yet too strenuous. The first is full of creatures [illegible] and the second is full of snakes. The film shows a good many interesting things.

"A Romany Tragedy" (Biograph).—Here is a film, the scene of which is laid among the Eastern Gypsies. It deals with the question of honor among those people and the vendetta which last until the dishonor is avenged. The features of the [illegible] horror of the girl when she discovers the man she must kill to avenge her brother's death is her savior. She lulls the poisoned cup, hoping to die herself, but her sister mixes them back and the lover pays the penalty.

"The State Line" (Lubin).—Here is a Western picture acted with all the spirit and vim which the Lubin players seem to put into their acting. Harry Blake, the principal character, is drawn true to life. There were, and are yet, men like him in that region. When he saves the Sheriff's daughter he acted upon his impulses. When he shoots his man he is [illegible] upon impulse. How could the sheriff do otherwise than allow him to get over the State line? Next comes the washing of the impending flood. Even though it took him back over the border he risked it, as any man of his type would have done. And the end is wedding bells, of course.

"The Niece and the Chorus Lady" (Edison).—Here is a lively and diverting light comedy. Marie Tener acts the part of the niece, Nancy Avril is the chorus lady, and the married man, about whom the difficulty centers, is Guy Coombs. The mother-in-law is somewhat disconcerted when she discovers that her precious son has married a chorus lady, but after [illegible] makes a clean breast of the thing everybody seems satisfied.

"The Temptress" (Essanay).—The theme of this film is the power of a designing woman over a weak man. She obtains his consent to commit murder, but his deserted sweetheart prevents it, and ultimately there is a complete untangling of the snarl. Aside from this one thing, the film possesses no great strength and in the opinion of this reviewer falls much below the standard of the average Essanay picture. It is not often that this house releases a poor film, but it has come dangerously near it this time), or one that offends the public taste as this one does. It has been taken off the screen in some places.

"Science vs. Quackery" (Gaumont).—Here is a sermon that should please the editor of the Ladies' Home Journal in his war against quack medicines. The view we get of the interior of the factory is interesting, and the turning of the plot upon the illness of the manufacturer's son gives it a touch that emphasizes the manufacturer's moral responsibility. Possibly many will get a new impression of a portion of the patent medicine industry.

"One of Nature's Noblemen" (Selig).—This is a Western ranch picture which is different. The feature is the estrangement of two friends and their reconciliation long years later, after one has performed a service for the other which could not be repaid. The audience becomes silent as it sees the story unfold, and there is involuntary applause when the reconciliation is at last effected. John Henley, nature's nobleman, is acceptably interpreted by Hobart Bosworth; Clay Brown, the man with a bad temper, but who married the girl, is W. T. Santschi; the baby, Baby Lillian, and she is an attractive little one, too.

"Cupid's Chauffeur" (Vitagraph).—Here is an interesting light-comedy in which a lover plays chauffeur for the girl and for objecting father, running them in among his friends, who act the parts of bold highwaymen. Then he plays hero and rescuer. The old man relents, and the couple get his blessing on the spot. Comedies of this type are enjoyed by the audience and there was no lack of appreciation in this instance.

"Musketeer" (Urban).—This dramatic sketch is of the slightest. It depicts the difficulties a musketeer had in carrying a message from an outpost to the commander. It is like one page of Dumas' great story; but it is well acted and interesting. It shows the costumes of Henry IV Musketeers.

"The Sleuth" (Urban).—This is a trick film. It's hero is a fool who plays sleuth to find the trunk thieves. He shuts himself in a big bag and gets stolen; of course he is thrown into the river and has other adventures before he gets his man. It is amusing.

"It Served Her Right" (Edison).—The iceman's face is the best thing in this comedy. It, like the other picture on this reel, is also very anecdote-like and very slight. The wife plays a much overdrawn jealousy fairly well; the husband, cook and iceman are puppets. The climax is mirth awakening.

"At Panther Creek" (Nestor).—This love story has a mining camp for its background. The hero is the owner's son working his way up, and the heroine is the daughter of the foreman. It is the foreman who objects to the love match. Difficulties follow, but the end is happy. The owner applauds his son's choice of a wife. The acting is good and the charm of the Nestorian photography is over all, each succeeding scene making an indelible impression upon those who see it.

"Fifty Years Ago" (Powers).—The military scenes in this picture are rich in burlesque quality; they are ridiculous. The war separated the two lovers in this story, and fifty years later they are brought together again. Yet there are very good scenes, too, for an old negro is very well pictured, and the breakfast table scene in which he waits on his old master is delightful. It was no small artist who directed those scenes; but the other scenes show a woful ignorance of military possibilities.

"Brave Swift Eagle's Peril" (Bison).—Swift Eagle is a Sioux of that village of tepees we have become acquainted with of late in Bison stories and in the first scene Bright Feather, a Cheyenne maiden, helps him to escape from the Cheyenne village. He, acording to this story, is romantic (Parkman said that no Indian ever was) and to protect Bright Feather from the unwelcome attentions of one of her own tribe he puts himself again in peril. It is Bright Feather who then rides to the Sioux village and brings help and she and Swift Eagle are married. The battle scene between the men of the two tribes is so plainly laid out, so as to show all the smoke, that it is lacking in interest even.

"A Trooper's Heart" (American).—Here is a film showing something of the spirit which animates men on the Mexican border. It is all interesting, but its feature is a cavalry charge that brings out a vigorous response. Those plunging horses please the audience immensely, and there is no question about its being exciting.

"Fountains of Rome" (Itala).—This short film gives pictures of the fountains of Rome. There are no titles, so we do not know the name of any one of these fountains. It has slight educational value.

"Dad's Girl" (Reliance).—This is not so sensational a story as some that this company has been producing of late. It is not a probably story, but since it awakens interest, not by its climax and denouement so much as by humor, one doesn't notice this weakness, save in one scene where the girl plainly foresees that the "lunco" man will soon come in and that she will get another good chance to put the fake package of bills in her dad's pocketbook. Such a picture doesn't allow much good acting, nor do we find it in this case.

"The Two Cockades" (Lux).—This is a tale of the times of the French Revolution. It presents the adventures of an aristocratic child spirited away to save his life and who returns twenty years later to offer his services to Napoleon. He is wounded, and later returns to his old home where the servant who spirited him away when a child recognizes and greets him.

"Tidying Up Paris" (Lux).—Because of complaints about the untidy condition of the streets the Paris commissioner orders them cleaned. And the men do it so effectively that everything, even the people, goes. The streets are clean enough to suit the most fastidious.

"Thwarted by Nell Pierce" (Yankee).—After a somewhat prolonged absence this melo-dramatic detective appears in a race with some jewel thieves. Overhauled by the motor boat in which is the detective, they throw the jewels into the sea. The feature of the film lies in the woman's donning the diver's armor and searching for the jewels on the bottom of the sea. There are numerous thrills in this picture and the audience was not backward in expressing its appreciation.

"The Love of a Gypsy Girl" (Great Northern).—This film does not measure up to those released recently by this company. The idea of the count falling in love with the Gypsy maiden is commonplace. There is a thrill when years afterward the Gypsies steal the count's child and the woman whom he once had wronged takes her home. The chase is not particularly convincing. The scene where the Gypsy takes the child across the stream is the best of the picture. The mechanical department did its part well.

"Three of a Kind" (Imp).—The Kellys needed the loan of a baby to get that $10,000 from Uncle Tom, who, it seems, wanted a namesake. Between Kelly and his wife they manage to borrow three, and a houseful of trouble. There are many comic situations following one after the other all through the reel and the audience laughed with delight as long as it was on the screen. It is a jolly, rollicking farce.

"The Two Gardeners" (Eclair).—When a story is set in pretty backgrounds, it would hardly be amiss to show the name of the places on the screen; novelists tell where their stories are set. "The Two Gardeners" is a romantic comedy, not of the uproarious kind, but one that gives much quiet enjoyment of the situations that often are very humorous. It is acted well, though parts of it would have been funny even with the poorest acting. The heroine, daughter of the owner is very pretty, and perfect in her part. The count-gardener, whom the heroine's mother thinks is Onesimus, is a good love-maker. Onesimus has to work hard, because he isn't known and that is all he gets for playing gardener. No wonder he and his mother are formal when they take their departure.

Scene from "The Sheepman's Daughter"—(American).

"The Birth Mark" (Yankee).—There is a strong story told in this picture and told without the overdoing of tragic scenes and emotions and the overacting that spoils so many good films. Another sub-title or two would have helped out the story some, but it is well constructed and clear. The acting is all so good that it is hard to pick out any one or two players as better than the rest. The first scene is very well done; the scene where the Indian tells Raven that it was he who shot the duke (why was a title necessary?) and shows why he did it is even better, and the scene where Raven meets again his wife is made powerful by remarkable restraint. More than one producer of photoplays could learn a lesson from that scene. The pictures of the office of N. W. R. Mounted Police are, one must feel, perfect.

"In the Great Big West" (Champion).—Here we have the story of a doctor who failed to keep an appointment with his sweetheart because duty called. Later they meet over the bedside of a patient in the West. Reconciliation follows, since the girl has learned the worth of a man who attends to his duty.

"The Minor Chord" (Imp).—Imp pictures seldom lack human interest, and this one is no exception. Gretchen, the young girl who falls in love with the susceptible violinist who rooms across the alley, gives, through the characterization of a talented actress, the chief interest to it. She is a simple-minded girl, not bashful, nor yet bold. She loves and she shows her love truthfully, but not wealthy minded. The picture is a good one. The Imp director has produced the story with skill, and though it is not very dramatic, the spectators will not fail to sympathize with Gretchen and become interested.

"Called Back" (Lux).—This story is a domestic tragedy with a reconciliation and its setting is a forest cabin. It gives a good chance, well utilized by the Lux players, for characterization. The father of the family is not convincing as a woodman, but his acting is very human. The mother and her flashy, loud-skirted sister who tries to break up the family are both excellent. The reviewer was especially delighted with the acting of the little girl, who realizes something of the situation as such a child was sure to, and shows a remarkable little burst of temper at the trouble made. The picture is a trouble to look back on, however. One suspects that the Lux Company kept the fire burning or long before it is actually its lack of reality wouldn't have been so apparent to the spectator eye

IF IT'S A NESTOR IT'S GOOD!

DAVID HORSLEY 147 Fourth Avenue NEW YORK CITY

it only for a moment. A red forest fire is a feature, surely, but the Rex Company came near spoiling a very good picture. The picture is strong enough, though, to stand these "feature scenes." The beauty of the last two scenes with the pool and the rescue of the child, not from the house, but from the forest, by carrying her into the water, are remarkably beautiful.

"Foolshead as a Life Insurance Agent" (Itala).—Mr. Deed is funny; he's the only funny thing about these trick pictures. The better we know him, the funnier he seems to grow. He is good in this film.

"An Officer and a Gentleman" (Solax).—There have been many military pictures this week and, while some of them have been very good, this picture is not with those. The story seems quite impossible and it gave little chance for sincere acting. It was received in silence. This reviewer asked one person how he liked it and he expressed disapproval. It is a story with an army post for its setting.

"Get Rich Quick" (Thanhouser).—This film pictures a young married couple, poor and discontented, then rich with ill-gotten gains, which they give back, become poor again and in poverty find the happiness they sought for. It teaches a healthy lesson, but it is like some old-style Sunday school story books—it is far from convincing. The Thanhouser Company has skilful players and they did remarkably well with this story. The poor widow was pictured very well indeed, except in the scene where the hero dreams he sees her out in the cold. It was meant to be a piteous picture, but, perhaps, because the actress was thinking of "The Two Orphans," she looked as though she wanted to smile. It was affecting to the hero though, for he pulled open the drawer of the table and there was the pistol. His wife keeps him from killing himself for shame of his deeds and he decides to give the money back to the poor people whom he has legally robbed. Skilful acting makes this play, just as it is, acceptable, but it might have been a great deal better.

"O'er Grim Fields Scarred" (Reliance).—This pictures war scenes, and its heroine (Miss Leonard) is a Southern woman who volunteers to retake important papers which Southern soldiers have lost. She seems unconvincingly confident as she takes up her mission. She gets past Union sentries in good old five-cent-novel style, which doesn't appeal to intelligence. When she gets the papers and comes back with them to save the planter's life, her holding-off of a Union colonel, captain, sergeant and some other armed men at the point of an 1860 pistol, while the papers are burning, is one of the most probable of her exploits. Apropos of this play, we might add that lieutenants don't salute sergeants first; soldiers don't "carry arms" in a dwelling under ordinary circumstances, they "trail arms"; corporals are never saluted by private soldiers, and military men walk about a room very much like human beings; the "right face," "left face" business is reserved for "parade," and formal moments.

"A Wartime Wooing" (Thanhouser).—Here is a Spanish-American war picture, with scenes laid in Cuba. A Spanish spy, the heroine of the story, falls in love with a young American lieutenant and the complications which come of it make the story interesting. It is very well acted; the soldiers and officers are perfect, though the lieutenant striking his superior, a captain, even under the provocation shown in this case, would probably have been shot, for this was in wartime.

"Civilization" (Powers). Here is a film, the theme of which is the refusal of an Indian chief to accept the ways of the white settlers. It is a story in types which interests. He had a hard alternative and the audience is in sympathy with the chief in his adherence to his own. The play is well acted and much of the dignity of the chief is brought out.

"The Peril of Diaz" (Champion).—Here we have a United States Army picture well worth seeing. All the branches of the service are shown in camp. Then the picture changes and the pontoon corps is shown constructing a bridge across the river. Last the men are shown at work. Included in the picture are views of the work of the signal corps. No manager will regret including this film in his program.

"Rattlesnakes and Gunpowder" (American).—This is a cowboy comedy that kept the audience laughing from beginning to end. The amusing stunts follow each other in such rapid succession that the laughs are without intermission.

"The Ranch Tenor," (American).—On the same reel with the above is another laugh maker. What happens to the singer and what happens when he sings are alike mirth makers.

"Exploits of a Napoleon Admirer" (Ambrosio).—This picture kept the audience chuckling, giggling or roaring from soon after it began till the end. The Napoleon admirer sees visions of the great general, and takes his cue from his dreams. In the most approved manner he does all the Napoleon "stunts," from taking snuff to decorating a tailor's dummy with a baggage clock. It is very funny, indeed.

"Tweedledum's Dream" (Ambrosio).—It was certainly a terrible nightmare of Tweedledum's when he dreamed he was a great detective. The stunts are of course tricks but the unexpected quality in them make them very funny. Plenty of ingenuity was utilized in thinking up all these "stunts," which usually are fresh enough even to be amusing.

"A Marvelous Cow" (Solax).—This film is a mean vaudeville. The country characters and the incident are all of the vaudeville kind. To pump a cow full to get milk is as old as Adam, precisely. Every time we see the natural way thinks he is the originator of the idea; but it surely made the New York audience roar with laughter. That a young business man and his wife shivered think cow now would furnish milk and butter ad libitum seems ridiculous, but perhaps one could find a good many in this big city with like ideas about a cow. There is much fun in the film.

The Electric Amusement Park, of Tulsa, Okla., has been granted a charter, with a capital stock of $1,000. The directors are Mark McCoy, C. C. Browning and H. C. Vandevanter, all of Tulsa.

Now comes Prof. J. C. Cone, head of the English classes of the Elgin, Ill., high school with another crime to lay at the door of the pinochle. His classes are stealing the plots of the moving pictures to use in writing "original stories." If this be true and the plagiarists should have seen some films that I have endured I can readily believe the statement that they "have had a serious effect on the originality of the student as well as lowering the standard of high school work in literary writing."

Among the new amusement concerns in the Superior Amusement Company, of Chicago, which has been granted a charter to do a general amusement business with capital stock of $30,000. The incorporators are Harry M. Rose, Samuel Spitzer and Elias Mayer. The same men received a charter to do business under the name of the Fort Wilmont Orpheum Company, of Chicago, with capital stock of $22,500.

All moving picture houses as well as other theaters in Pekin, Ill., are to be fumigated at least once a week by order of the board of health of that city. (Must be a dirty town).

New England.

The Optimus Theater, of Mystic, Conn., is nearly completed, and this house opens with a ten-cent policy. Pictures and vaudeville will make up the program.

The Colonial Theater, Onset, Mass., opened its summer season of pictures and vaudeville on May 27. W. F. Fiynn has contracted to supply the house with his best grade of independent service. Vaudeville acts will also be introduced at the Colonial.

Mr. J. J. Flynn has announced that he has contracted with the Boston office of the General Film Company to supply all its parks, similar to theaters, with licensed service, beginning Sunday, July 2. General Manager Lowrie Appleby, of the Star Theater, Boston, will represent Mr. Flynn at the General Film Company, and will select the pictures to be used in the various parks, etc. Mr. Flynn evidently places much confidence in Mr. Appleby's ability and judgment as a "film dopester." This commission is a splendid one for an honest, as Mr. Flynn is a veteran amusement man in New England. He has interested in a score of theaters throughout this section.

A new theater is soon to be erected at Revere Beach, Mass., which will devote itself to pictures and vaudeville. The plans for this house are now in the architects' hands. When completed the house will seat approximately 750, and will include a balcony. The theater is to be on Revere Street, and has an excellent location. A first class, up-to-date moving picture theater is expected with admission at 10 cents.

Benedict J. Fitzgerald was the guest of the St. Croix Council, Knights of Columbus, recently, and delivered an address on the "Monuments of Paris." The lecture was illustrated by slides and moving pictures taken during a recent trip to Europe.

The Airdome, New Bedford, Mass., will be opened by Mr. William Hinkley, who will manage the theater. The house will seat about 1,200, and will play moving pictures and vaudeville. The house will open about June 15.

These columns have told previously of the troubles arising from the alleged discrimination of Portsmouth, N. H. moving picture theaters, against soldiers and sailors in uniform. The matter came to a focus on Saturday, May 28, when the city council of Portsmouth at an adjourned meeting rescinded the license of Messrs. Mahoney & Mahoney, the proprietors of the Premier Seventh Avenue, for alleged discrimination against soldiers and sailors in uniform. Immediately after this, however, a license was granted Messrs. Gray & Mahoney for the city for ensuing year, and the matter came to an end. The council then passed an order prohibiting the operation of a moving picture theater and dance hall in Portsmouth. This ruling is made to apply to all theaters or amusement resorts of any sort in the city of Portsmouth. The trouble has been brewing for some time, and it was thought that the ruling of the management would permit the sailors in uniform to enter any part of their respective establishments to the offer. By the present ruling this is prohibited, and no further trouble of this sort is contemplated in Portsmouth. Large numbers of sailors make a favorite point for a picture, and this ruling is an excellent one in every way.

Messrs. Selbick & Hill, of New York City, have been notified by the City Council of Gardner, Mass., that their application to operate an open air performance of moving pictures and vaudeville has been turned down. The reason assigned for the action is that the airdome would be an means of drawing an undesirable element into the city. Messrs. Selbick and Hill may attempt the erection of their airdome in another Massachusetts city.

Manager Harold F. Jackson, of the Hilton Theater, Fitchburg, Mass., remarked that the heat was is rolling out in fine fashion, and that the weather must become warmer if he is to close his house over the summer.

HENRY

Boston.

At a meeting held in Boston, Friday, May 26, for the election of officers of the New England Managers' Association, the following were chosen: President, R. G. Lassee, of Keith's Theater, Boston; vice-presidents, Harry Katzes, of the Auditorium Theater, Lynn, Mass.; D. J. Adams, of White's Open House, Concord, N. H., and Hiram Abrams, of the Portland Theater, Portland, Me.; treasurer, H. E. Jones, of Potter Hall, Boston; secretary, Charles F. A. Smith, of the Unique Theater, Boston. Lowrie Burgess, general manager of the old South and Washington theaters, Boston, and vice-president of the Revere Beach, Boston, and Colonial Theater, Nashua, N. H., were named as the board of directors. Nearly every theatrical manager in the moving picture theaters, and both Mr. Burgess and Mr. Lowrie are operating picture and vaudeville houses. This association is a protective one, and is allied with the Managers' Association in vogue throughout the country. It is a sort of counter organization to the White Rats, the organization of the union. The organization will also busy itself with a general civic ownership, guarding its interests from any unjust legislation, and generally watch the best interests of its theaters.

Mr. Joseph Mack, resident manager of the Hub Theater, Washington Street, playing "pop" vaudeville and pictures, will have his annual benefit performance tendered to him June 4. This is a yearly event as a tribute to Mr. Mack's efficient handling of the Hub.

Plans are now ready for a large moving picture and vaudeville theater, to be erected in Beacon Halls, Washington Street. The blue prints of the theater are already completed, and the first work will soon be started. The two first floors, now occupied by a furniture store, will be removed, in order to make room for a large lobby. The house will hold a balcony seating about 340, while the orchestra will seat 1,000. Mr. Mayer, who is backing the venture, states that he expects to have a first-class house, up-to-date in every particular. Admission will be 10 cents and vaudeville will be used in connection with an extensive program of moving pictures.

The Apollo Theater, Washington Street, is now nearing completion and will soon have its first opening. The house is said will be the most modern in roof. Mr. Carl Murtin, formerly of the Paradise Theater, Boston, is to manage the house. Manager Martin has a goodly share of experience in this line, and should make a success of the Apollo. Chances are favoring a 5 cent admission rate for the house, with no vaudeville on the program.

Manager Appleby, of the Star Theater, Boston, is continuing to add to the attractions of the look over the ground. Mr. Appleby states that it has been so long since he struck the "big town," that he is afraid he will not be able to operate. "I'm looking things over," was the reply, when asked concerning his visit.

At a meeting of the Moving Picture Operators' Union, 182 held in Homestead Hall, 724 Washington Street, it was reported that every theater in Boston is now unionized. It was also announced that all theaters in cities and towns between Brockton on the south side of Boston and Maynard on the other, had been unionized. Two new members were admitted, and the union took cognizance of the International convention, to be held at Buffalo, by electing as delegates to attend that convention Messrs. Lawrence Tempest and Bernard Corbett. It is understood that $20 00 were realized from the sale of tickets for the concert, held at Paine Memorial Hall, Roxbury, May 25. This organization is in a most flourishing and prosperous condition, with harmony always prevailing at all meetings.

Cleveland.

The Lake Shore Film Co. a branch in Columbus, and that of the Buckeye Film Co. have consolidated, under the corporate name of the Buckeye Lake Shore Film Co. These two found to be too small an amount of positive business to divide profitably between two companies. Nothing else in changes in that territory especially at this season of the year.

The General Film Co. has opened its Toledo branch office, and the Detroit office is now saving for the needs of the deposed exhibitors of that city.

The Faber Theater, on Broadway, has solved the summer problem by closing up and opening an airdome a short distance away.

The success in the motion picture field is and chances achieved by those who were responsible for vaudeville and the "legit." is again illustrated in Cleveland by the resignation of Mr. Vincent Woodward, who was recently placed in charge of the fate of the Lake Shore Film Co.'s theaters. The position was advertised in the World and of the dozens of applicants Mr. Woodward, as master of his work and successful experience, a good man was chosen. His encouraging endeavors and results in the line required, and thereby was proved to a finish to the inevitable axiom of "no losing a Picture Man" and to recovering his resignation, submit his first unsatisfactory failure to house good.

The present plans have changed under the charge of Mr. Max Stromberg, the genial treasurer of the Lake Shore Film Co.

Lowrie Appleby, manager of the popular picture theater, 12 & 14 N. Clark street, has resigned his position with the Orpheum, on June 15, to assume the new exclusive picture house, which is now being erected on the same site. As the present management has been unable to secure the new theater now occupied by Appleby, the latter will open a rival house on the opposite side of the street.

A parade to herald a new theater opening Sunday, at the corner of E. 55th street and Euclid avenue, has been supplied for by Mr. S. Bedusek. The theater itself is now in the hands of the painters and will be finished and furnished in every manner. Moving pictures will form the program.

Seven members now look forward to the venerable position of Dad Vail. Mr. Vincent Woodward, "The waiter and thinker of motion picture managers gave up to wonders in the magical power of water transformed and electrified, and now waves for the municipal management, and Mr. Moving picture machines are to "take the road" with entertainments which seem to promise long life and many contingencies. This being the first films are not as known to the public as they deserve. Managers have attempted to take advantage of the interest of the public in motion pictures, but since the average appreciation of the public is not educated to the appreciation of the cleverness of arrange and defense of the motion picture service, announced that he would not be a candidate for the Woodward proposes of being chosen by those who were instrumental in his election.

Cleveland was renowned to be the busiest city in the United States during a part of the recent hot weeks, all records for that being broken, during "rest at the time when the summer parks were opened for the season, exhibitors who had cut of the motion-crowds. Manager Appleby, of the Star Theater, one manager gave five nets of vaudeville and three reels of pictures to the people who contributed $4.65 to his bank account. Who can beat that?

When a manager transforms his other into a good imitation of a store guide by making rosters of all sorts and sizes, and every available space inch he is making showing we appreciate is getting him much notice. That is reason what the manager of the Alhambra Theater has turned on us now what color your lobby is painted, brother.

NATIONAL TO GO INDEPENDENT.—The National Theater is changing its policy to attract, which for years has been using Licensed service. It is to go independent beginning the week of May 29th.

STAR GOES INDEPENDENT.—The Star Theater (just 5th Street between Los Angeles and Main Streets, which has been using Licensed service, but will in the near future go independent. The house has been remodeled and redecorated.

LEASE CHANGES HANDS.—The lease of the Randall Theater, Fifth and Main streets, has recently been transferred to Messrs. Sawyer, Los Angeles, and Mat Dennis, Pasadena.

FISHER'S PASADENA THEATER.—When Fisher's present theater, on Fair Oaks avenue, Pasadena, was built some years ago for $6.5, to seat seating 700 people, it was thought a good and was almost the only place of its stage elevation in the town. Since increasing the house to seat 1,000 people, and the stage to meet the ordinance did not accommodate some of the companies that played there, so the house has been enlarged by adding 250 more seats that can be thrown to practically seat 1,250 people, with the installation of new scenery.

BEACH AIRDOME.—Hermosa Beach, a small beach town, near Los Angeles, is to have its first summer resort. Work has been started on the airdome, which is to be 100 by 150 feet in size, to seat 1,000 people.

KAISER WITHDRAWS FROM LIBERTY.—Mr. Kaiser, of the firm of Kaiser & Virgo, Spring Arcade, has withdrawn from the firm, and has entered in the same business. His stand will be on Spring street in the Merchants and Wholesale theaters.

BUTLER'S CLOSES.—Butler's Theater and Film Street has recently had its present a burning street, located some time ago. The theater is now in a smoldering condition, and will be torn down.

In a quietly but very effective manner the Orpheum Theater, Main street, has changed its policy. It opened its doors as an exclusive vaudeville house, and has now added moving pictures to its bill.

HYMAN'S VENICE THEATER OPENS.—Hyman's Venice Theater in Venice, Cal., was opened on May 27. The theater is a handsome structure, and is said to be one of the finest in the state. The house will have a seating capacity of 1,000 people, and will be devoted to moving pictures and vaudeville. The opening was a success in every way. Wells Fargo & Co. have the booking of the house.

WONDERLAND.—The Wonderland, on Main street, has been remodeled, and is now one of the most handsome of the moving picture houses in the city. The opening of the house took place on May 27, and was a success in every way. Wells Fargo & Co. have the booking of the house.

ADVERTISING FOR MAMMA.—A poor man's business and his home are managed by two children who have learned the value of advertising. The little girl runs a newspaper and the little boy runs a delivery wagon. The little girl runs a newspaper and the little boy runs a delivery wagon. The little girl runs a newspaper and the little boy runs a delivery wagon

A SMILE OF A CHILD.—An ill-tempered Prince is met by a little child who is wandering through his grounds, and his entire nature is changed into one of excessive good nature. Later, while out on a lark he meets for the first time a very pretty peasant woman, to whom he, by virtue of his rank, makes unasked advances. It happens that she is the mother of the same child and it enters in time to amuse the Prince to his better self till the sweet smile and sassy wink, which wink is really infectious of good nature.

MELIES.

HER SPOILED BOY.—Robert Burton was an only son and his indulgent mother had spoiled him. Bob was not all bad, but he was wayward and could not stick long at any one task. Also he paid more attention to rolling cigarettes than to and to his work. One day he was discharged by the foreman of the crockery store where he worked and appeared at home disgusted and sullen. His mother tried to comfort him, but the boy was anxious to have his way and announced his intention of going West, where he thought there would be better opportunities for him.

Poor Mrs. Burton, who was a widow, was horror-struck at the idea of letting her only child away from her; but habit was too strong and so she gave in to Bobby in this as in other things.

She supplied him with money from their meager store, and he arrived in the West and was fortunate enough to secure work on a ranch. His idea of his own business did not appeal the cow-boys, however, and they hazed him in a pretty rough manner. Bob left that job and a number of others, and since he was unpopular he took to drink.

One day, when all his money was gone and he was desperate, as he had received no reply to the letter he had written his mother for aid, he held up the mail carrier and escaped with the mail-bag. The sheriff was soon on his trail, but Bob eluded him and sought refuge in a dilapidated cabin, where he had a chance to open the letters he had stolen.

From one there fell a ten dollar bill, and the boy's aroused eyes caught his own name and his mother's familiar handwriting. He suddenly realized how unmanly he was, and how little he deserved the mother he had. Seized with a sudden determination, he gave himself up and served his term in prison, after which he returned to his aged mother, who had never failed to ask each day for "the letter that never came."

PATHE.

A ROUGH DIAMOND.—Fritz Meister sits in his cottage bemoaning his poverty. His child is sick and querulous, refusing to take her medicine, and he finds that the mother's fearful pleadings irritate him still further. He presently leaves, takes up his gun and goes out. He is a poacher and has always been one, altogether he is a bad character and one whose reform is regarded as hopeless. That day, whilst in the act of shooting a rabbit, Fritz is caught by the owner of the estate himself, who, however, dismisses him with a kindly warning. Fritz returns home to find that the sick child's wife and young son have stopped the other kindly act to the distressed mother. The boy has coaxed the child to take her medicine and already she seems less ailing. But the incident is soon forgotten by him, and a few days later he is back in the woods again, creeping stealthily up towards the forbidden game. Before he has time to make a shot, however, a couple of rough looking men spring upon him, and in spite of his struggles thrust him up to the big house, where he sees them attempt to force an entrance. They quickly are driven off, and Fritz goes to the cottage, but until help is at hand. The good service thus rendered to him is not forgotten by the rich owner, who offers him a position in his establishment, and the poacher, in whom a new self-respect has been aroused by the events of the last few days, accepts the offer with ready thankfulness.

THE INSUBORDINATE SOLDIER.—The story opens with a village street, when Young Weathe'by, a private in the army, offers a drink to one of the Indians from the nearby reservation. Lieutenant Mason interferes and proceeds to arrest The Indian's daughter, Mojilway, appeals to Mason's assistance and in later days watches over her mother. Weatherby is court-martialled and dishonorably discharged from the army, and finding disgrace and an enemy in all around him, finds a party of bandits shouting from a telegram which he has picked up and which Mason, also disgraced, unknowingly a shipment of money for the Army just which Weather by knows Mason will go for. On Mason's return from the Express office he is attacked by the bandits and receives a beating up, but Mojilway rides past the scene of the encounter at a gallop, snatches the money bag from Mason's saddle and delivers it to the commanding officer and tells of Mason's bravery. In a thrilling fight Mason is finally rescued and Weatherby gets the just punishment for his crime.

KHMARA.—Khmara, the daughter of Hawaiian peasants, falls in love with Rodiweg, a tall and muscular young peasant, and Rodiweg sees for the first time at the St. John's Festival. Rodiweg loses his heart at the first sight of her. Khmara, wishing to know what the Fates may have in store for her, steals away from the throng and casts her wreath of flowers and leaves into the river; suddenly sinks and, according to the superstition of the peasants, the handiest presages ill luck. Khmara weeps bitterly but Rodiweg, who has followed her, laughs the superstition to scorn and declares his love. Khmara's father, finding Rodiweg has neither money nor possessions, refuses his consent driving the young man out with unduly hard names. Rodiweg thereupon goes to ask for help of a powerful priest versed in the occult skills of his village. He listens to Rodiweg's tale, gives him a couple of new coral necklaces and an abducting Khmara. So Rodiweg steals Khmara away. He carries her to the camp, but whilst a few hasty preparations are being made for their union, Khmara's father appears to contest for the return of his daughter. The parties between sides, the latter succeeds in capturing Rodiweg, and after uniting Khmara and Rodiweg himself he entails the latter in his service.

A BROKEN LIFE.—The cowboys on the ranch are wildly excited over the report of another gold strike on the Yukon and Fitz, one of the best of the cowboys, fits he make, takes an affectionate leave of his little sweetheart Mary. Later on Fitz arrives at the gold fields and finds Dan. Then we see them striking pay dirt and finally we see Fitz and his partner Dan on their way back to Mary's father has died and he decides to return to her as she is now an orphan. All the boys ride up to give him a rousing send off. On the trail however, Jim is attacked by a bandit robbed of his gold and left for dead. The bandit meeting his enemy, Death, goes past Mary's home to woo Jim. One day a stranger enters the house and we find Mary, after a short struggle, dead. Fitz's soul is in mourning. Fitz goes to the gold mines to make them pay happy. One evening they accidentally explode a charge and we see Mary and her child and she reappears Jim, he is no more a husband and a father, and to him Fate brings these the bandit who robbed him of his gold, but rather than ruin the happiness of the girl he loves Jim goes away and leaves them in peace.

About the same time a young man, one of a group in the club one evening, bets the old fellow say that the profits of banks are favorable of any real accomplishment even of opening their own living upon the time. He takes up the challenge and makes a wager that no one can get his own paying for a concert without the use of assistance from anybody, and the wager was accepted. Of course two wages lose to the same office where the young lads has found employment and they become good friends. Each one of them is in love to be a poor wage earner. The same office someone is in need for help of some kind and the boys come up the conflict and finally and the two drawer together. The young lawyer is interested for and with the assistance of the boys and the young man promotes his daughter next to a quite sum that have to put one over in the board for him, and about the time the young wage earner sees success that he is married a family of friends and a home of their own. Then the lawyer young wage earner is the end of the story the second he has performed to be won over young or young wife and the boys are ready to pay for it. And so they agree to settle the matter once and for all. They agree to the proposition that he has first taken the young wage earner and takes them one by one by a series of new positions, each one of which is more responsible and has better engagements with a number of men are ready to pay of the employer himself offered for to become the young wage earner. The boys agree that the longer is all to the end of the story.

Meanwhile the unnatural condition, tries to pick a quarrel with Walton on account of the latter's complaints on his condition. Young Morton finally tries to silence Walton, but young Jim nobly defends his comrade, striking his head and remains unconscious.

Inside, under the guise of friendship, induces Walton to remain over in their room overnight. Walton, however, tells young Morton who is to be sent for the doctor should he not be released in time, so young Morton is started for the town. He then writes a note to Walton, saying that Marion died somewhat immediately of a fractured skull and advising him to flee the country. Walton, believing that he had killed his companion's husband and knowing that he could never get back to Marion, hastens to obey the note, after sending Harold a note of farewell, packs a few belongings and departs.

Weeks and months pass on and on the Panama Canal, where he has secured employment under an assumed name. One day he suddenly receives news from the states that his innocence is proven, which fact gives the happy engagement of his friend Harold and Marion. Walton, being an intended victim of the latter's treachery, decides to see his old friends once more and soon gives himself up to the authorities.

He arrives at Helen's house and while nervously awaiting her appearance he comes upon a photo of her brother in cowboy garb and dated less than a month previous. The sudden release from the strain under which he has been for many months, is too much for him and he becomes hysterical from joy at learning that the man whom he thought he had killed was still alive.

Helen enters the room and is clasped in the arms of an apparent madman and it is with considerable effort that she can wring from him the true cause of his long absence. Death is announced and upon entering is confronted by the victim of his treachery. Helen takes the situation in hand, and ordering him from the house, rushes once more to her lover's arms.

HEROES THREE.—The Heroes Three are young society men whose heroism consists in the fact that they are members and organizers of an amateur fire department in the small suburb where they live, of course their uniforms, brass buttons and so forth, prove a potent factor with the girls of the community and give them a decided advantage over all the other young fellows, even over those who happen to own an automobile. But their newfound glory comes to grief when the first alarm is turned in. Their desire to look well before the girls makes them tarry over their firemen's toilets while the house burns. And when they arrive at the fire engine house they discover that this same toilet-making has made them all forget their keys and they have to send a small boy after them. Meanwhile the house burns merrily on. They, when they get the hose reel out and start for the fire in a gallant run, they are followed by their admiring admirers, who are taken by the three rival young men in their automobiles. On the way our heroes throw are seen to get into an altercation with the their helpers and are left to drag the heavy hose reel along while the other young folks in the auto dash by them and urge them on to deeds of valor. When they do reach the fire the house is burned to the ground and is a heap of smoldering ruins. Then the three tired young heroes shower their three rivals holding their three particular affinities in their arms in the automobile. This be too much for them and having the hose in their hands they can hardly be blamed if they take advantage of the situation and literally put something over the other fellows and the girls.

MISTAKES WILL HAPPEN.—A fussy old maid, who has a constant fear of burglars, is about to look up her home for out-of-town visit. On her way to the railway depot she stops at the nearest police station with a request that her premises be closely watched during her absence. The sergeant calls the policeman of that particular post, who enters her name and address in his notebook. She then hurries to the depot, arriving just as the train is pulling out. In her anxiety to catch it, she stumbles and falls. Disappointed and bruised she returns home. That night the policeman, while on duty, pays special attention to her house, and seeing a light, also the shadow of a moving body on the window shade of an upper room, jumps to the conclusion that it is a burglar, and sets about to capture him. The old maid, who is about to retire for the night, hears the policeman trying the door and window and becomes greatly alarmed, under the impression that a burglar is prowling about the house. Half dead with fright she hides in the wardrobe, where she nearly suffocates. By this time the policeman has gained an entrance and is cautiously looking about the room when mysterious sounds coming from the wardrobe startle him. Revolver in hand, he opens the wardrobe door to capture his man when, to his utter disgust and dismay, the old maid falls into his arms

VITAGRAPH.

FOR HER BROTHER'S SAKE.—Albert Black leaves his home town to accept a position in a bank in the city, becomes entangled in the allurements of the fast set and is detected embezzling from his employers. His father is notified of his dishonesty and refuses to assist him.

The family has given the young man up as an exile or dead. Bessie is married to a physician, Dr. James Paton. One night while the doctor is away from home answering a call, Albert Black, now a dishonest fellow, breaks into his sister's home to rob it and unexpectedly to both, he and his sister meet face to face. She takes some money from her husband's desk, gives it to him and lovingly embraces him and kisses him good-bye.

A busy-body happens to see the shadow of the doctor's wife and her brother in loving embrace and tells the doctor when he reaches home. The doctor disbelieves his wife and, leaving her at once, goes to another city to establish a trade.

The doctor, while ministering to the sick at one of the hospitals, is surprised to learn that one of his patients is his wife's brother. The sick man tells him everything, which causes him to pass into the realms of eternity.

Doctor Paton returns to his wife, explains everything, and is made happy when his wife presents him with a baby boy, who was born during his absence.

THE SACRIFICE.—During Nick Austin's imprisonment his wife passes away. Before she dies, she writes a note to her husband, asking him to put her little girl in the care of an orphan asylum. Mrs. Downes, while bringing some of her dead daughter's clothes to the asylum, takes a fancy to Nick Austin, and adopts her.

One year later, Mrs. Downes visits State's Prison, with her adopted daughter and husband. As they pass the cell where Nick Austin is confined, Nick lands him a dower. Eventually Nick Austin is released and in search of his daughter, overshadowing. Arriving at the Downes' home, he clasps his daughter to his breast, but, realizing his inability to provide for her, withdraws without letting her know their relationship.

THE CHANGING OF SILAS WARNER.—Silas Warner dictates a letter recommending his son, Harry, to the college of once and enter his office as an employee. Furthermore, Mr. Warner has in mind the marriage of his son to his partner's daughter.

When Harry receives his father's letter, he returns home and takes a decided stand in opposition to his father's ideas. Furthermore, Harry is about to be married to Rose Blend.

Warner's partner, Martin, turns out to be a defaulter, and almost ruins the firm. Harry reads a newspaper account of his father's ills and trouble, so he and his wife go to see and assist him. As Mr. Warner is convalescent, he extends to his son and wife his parental blessings.

THE TRAPPER'S DAUGHTER.—Norma, is often left alone when her father is in quest of game. One day, an Indian, attracted by the girl's good looks, attempts to make love to her, but is felled with a blow of Dick's fist, her lover. The Indian departs, but swears vengeance.

Dick, who has started out on a hunting trip, discovers Norma's father, caught in one of his own traps. He assists him home, only to find that the Indian, during their absence, has kidnapped the girl. Dick at once starts in search of his sweetheart.

Dick is now making his way over mountains until he comes upon the Indian's camp. He approaches cautiously, knocks the red man down, cuts the ropes that bind the girl and rushes home.

Dick soon reaches the cottage, where he finds the old man in despair, which soon turns to joy when he embraces his daughter, and grasps Dick's hand in gratitude.

PROVING HIS LOVE.—Lloyd Stanwood, a young reporter, is assigned by the managing editor to interview a famous actress, by the name of Alice Gordon. He lands the interview, secures her photograph and finds himself in love at the close of the session.

When a telephone announcement is sent in to the paper that Miss Gordon is engaged to Mr. Archie Stanwood is disconcerted, especially when the rest of the boys join in a hearty laugh at the expense of his discomfiture. Miss Gordon denies this rumor to Stanwood when he asks her for its confirmation.

Two weeks later, Alice Gordon is injured in an automobile accident. Stanwood goes to the hospital, interrogates the nurse, is very much relieved when he learns that she is not fatally hurt. Some weeks after this interview, Miss Gordon leaves the hospital and goes to her home. She is a woman of ideas and to test the love of her many admirers, she disfigures her face with an ugly scar that would test the depth or superficiality of any man's protestations of affection.

Her adorers begin to arrive, she discloses the horrible blemish to her countenance. Shortly after the other shows his insincerity, Lloyd Stanwood is announced, he greets and congratulates Miss Gordon on her recovery and declares anew his love, she shows the scar and tells him that he would not want to marry a woman with such a repulsive mark. He repudiates the reflection upon his truthfulness and honor. She cannot longer keep in suspense a man who has so fully proven his love and won hers. Dipping her handkerchief in a glass of water, she removes the painted scar from her face. Alice holds out both her hands, he understands and readily clasping them in his, draws her closely to him and she rests her head upon his breast.

TEACHING McFADDEN TO WALTZ.—McFadden's wife is obliged to stay home because Mack cannot trip the light fantastic. However, he decides to learn, and his teacher advises him to practice at home. So he dances with Carrie, the maid in the cook, and with himself in the cellar. One day his wife catches him dancing with the maid, and reprimands him for his familiarity.

He is invited to attend a masquerade ball which he gladly accepts. He asks his wife to go, but she refuses. Even though he is disappointed, he takes his wife to the opera and tries to Romeo suit. His wife also decides to attend the ball, and dresses as Juliet.

At the ball Romeo is much attracted to Juliet and Juliet to Romeo. They dance all evening together and, much to their surprise, when they remove their masks.

THE TRIBE'S PENALTY.—Dorothy Stone, the daughter of a white settler in the West, goes to a house one day for a ride on horseback to the village but on the way is intercepted by a party of Indians who, after a brief chase, capture her and taking her to the village, bring her before the chief. Admiring the girl's beauty, the chief declares he will make her his bride and orders Gray Dog to take her to a lodge and guard her. At the lodge the girl finally pleads with Gray Dog to go back to her people and is finally forced into the tent, while Gray Dog stands at guard outside. At night Gray Dog, peeping under the tent, is awakened suddenly by a rustling in the grass. A moment later a dusky half-breed scouts leaps into tent and rescuing over his body, creeps out on the other side. With a cut of knife Gray Dog manages to set his feet and hands free and then runs to join the Indians in the exciting chase. Instantly nearly the entire tribe is supposed to be in pursuit of the drawing out of blood and yelling. Finally the girl and man's wounded arm thus winning his admiration and gratitude. The chief then presents him of the girl's hand and and hops that she be sent home to her people. But the chief reforges and no longer trusting Gray Dog sends him and his young men to search the mother. Gray Dog has faith enough to liberate the girl and after a fight with the men guard takes the girl away. At the white man's home Gray Dog is rewarded to remain and fare sumptuously on time with the white girl. His hopelessness is made apparent to him, however, when he finds the girl to a white man's arms and in despair Gray Dog resolves to return to his people and receive his punishment for his treachery to the tribe. The other redmen are incensed and humiliate by the squaws of the tribe and is then dragged off to the stake where he hesitantly swallows his life.

Smith's Marmalade

A Burlesque—With Turkish Atmosphere

The "wise ones" in the exhibiting business who look to Powers for REAL novelties will not be disappointed in this one. It's neither a drama nor a comedy nor, a scenic nor an educational—IT'S A "BURLESQUE"! Something new in the film way, eh? And it's a RICH burlesque, too; about a hundred people in the cast, all costumed and garbed in the sumptuous fashion of the Turk. And the SETTINGS! Oh, that we could justly describe 'em! But we'd rather have you wait for the picture itself, which is easily a credit to

The Haunted Island

A Mystery—With Island Settings

This is one of the most gripping and pleasing enigma stories we have turned loose in a long while. We call it an "enigma story" because from the start to finish it keeps you guessing what the solution will be to the wonderful puzzle the plot presents. You are carried along with the shipwrecked couple in their unique adventures, and so realistic and lifelike do their experiences seem that you feel they are real people, cast away on an actual barren island, and you a rescuing sea captain viewing all through a sharp spy-glass. The picture will be recognized for many moons to come as one of the very best mystery-dramas that ever carried

THE PIECE OF STRING.—Anton Paxton, a young man of saving habits, agrees against the good will of some and wishes to the villages. On his way he stops for dust with his sweetheart, Lucille Anderson, at his gate of the house and is surprised to find her talking with the younger brick smith, much to the chagrin of the girl. Anton, in consternation, but the girl shows her preference for him and the blacksmith goes away in a rage.

The blacksmith goes to his forge where he is followed by a basket of assistants, whose duties run to humor. Among these the blacksmith lightens. In the evening, the hunting dress his prince and his dog appears to up and he evening through the forest, where you wallet among the rocks. The hunted business one noise, searches to his dog, and rides to the village inn.

Anton passes the sweetheart and goes on to the village and to passing the store of the smith, he sees a piece of string, picks it up, and as he absentmindedly passes it his pocket, and passes on. The blacksmith and the assistant note his action, but no one sees what he picks up.

The rumor circulates his loss and creates a notion of suspicion between the people of the village and the well of one has had starts out. The blacksmith tells him of Anton picking up an article near the pavement. Anton is found in the inn and accused of stealing the wallet. He is confronted by the smith and assistant and he denies the charge. He is called before a magistrate, where he is questioned, but there is not found on his person. He protests his innocence, his sweetheart standing by his corner. His corner is overcome by it, a thief and has acted as patient.

At supper the prosecutor proposes a powerful ser- ence to the jury of quilling and the congregation all of some present, and Anton and he leaves the court in disgrace.

THE WITCH OF THE RANGE.—In the mountains these lived an old woman who claimed the gift of the sight. She was generally called her "The Witch of the Range."

One morning the witch comes to the Bar 40 ranch and induces Jim Garner, the foreman, to have his fortune told. Looking into his palm, and making her mysterious passes, she predicts a dire future for him. She continues on her way and Jim, approaching the ranch house, encounters Anna Taylor, the daughter of the ranch owner. Jim had long ago determined to make her his wife, and finding her alone, attempts to force his welcome attentions upon her. She is struggling to escape, when Ed. Warren, a neighboring ranch-with the nets, but Edith, interposing, drags the young man to Dorothy's room, where after only humbly apologizes, but eventually wins the girl's heart.

BILL AT PLAY.—Bill and his wife attend a race meeting, and the little comedian is so struck with the performance of the jockeys that he determines to learn to ride. Imparting this information to Mrs. Bill, which she—she—indicates—receives with an ominous shake of the head. Bill sets off and purchases a large hobby-horse. He brings his new acquisition along to a cafe, where he proceeds to give it some straw. A lady's bag gives him a new idea, and stuffing the straw in it, he makes a respectable sausage. The lady is naturally irate, so Bill dashes off with his steed, causing innumerable people to fall suddenly into various positions. At last a policeman comes in sight, and Bill, his horse, and the officer have a lively wrestle, during which our "horseman" takes his seat. Finally we see him at home his face wreathed in bandages, but still with a cheerful "Bill" smile.

man, comes up and, taking in the situation at a glance, knocks her senseless down.

A few days later it is found that cattle are disappearing from the Bar 13 range and are mysteriously sent to Jim Ferrier as the owner. The cowboys accuse him point blank but he succeeds them by attaching the loss to witchcraft, and proposes watching the watch. The cowpunchers cowboys agree and they go to the witch's hut and drag her, screaming and struggling, to the nearest tree.

Anna Taylor is picking flowers by the roadside as the lynching party approaches and, realizing a crime is about to be committed, conceals herself until they pass and then hastens to notify the old of Bill Warren. They arrive in time to stop the tragedy and the witch is overcome with gratitude. She promises to her life by placing curses upon her friends and curses upon her would-be murderers.

Jim Carter, realizing that the discovery of his depredations is close at hand, resolves to be avenged upon Anna for giving the witch and determines to kidnap her and compel her to marry him. He carries out his intentions with very little trouble for Ben Taylor is out of the way for some time. The witch witnesses the danger. Ed. Lacey sends one of his men to notify the ranchers and hurries away himself to see the witch. He overtakes Carter in the mountains, and in the fight that follows Carter receives the cowboys carry the desperado back to meet out justice in the stern court of Judge Lynch. Ed. Warren and Anna Taylor remain behind in the stricken woman, the first human sympathy she had ever known.

LAW AND ORDER ON THE BAR L RANCH—The cowboys on the "Bar L" outfit are disposed to disregard the orders of the boss and the very mouth of they please. Moreover, they take a hand at dominating over him and between the boss and their natures and his wife's peppery tongue, his life is not an unbroken calm.

One day he comes upon the boys playing and wrestling in the sand and, seeing them are not attending to their cattle, and he starts to remonstrate with them. They quickly rope him and prevent him from interfering. His wife hails him in his predicament and, after cutting him down, proceeds to abuse him and give him a sound thrashing.

Smarting under the sense of his wrongs, he determines to be avenged and employs a gun-fighter to subdue the rebellious cowboys. Upon his ally in the bath, he goes among the boys and is immediately attacked by the gun-slinging stranger. He wildfires for his assistant who now appears, and loses the cowboys up at the point of his gun. Worn out of the battle-ground by the exhaustion the gun-fighter as his own bravery. The tables are turned and the cowboys, emboldened by the assistance of their new employer, resort to the use of the watering trough and give him a thorough soaking.

They engage in heaving objects at each other. When his wife finds him later and, prying him out, she assumes her reckless spouse and then leaves him to ponder on "What's the use?"

THE COWBOY'S RUSE—John Norris, a wealthy Chicago banker, is spending the summer in the West, accompanied by his daughter Nellie. He meets Mrs. Thompson, a young widow, and the two spend many happy hours together.

One day on the golf links Mrs. Norris insinuates Mrs. Thompson in the mysteries of her favorite pastime and she becomes so interested she mistakes him for her ball. Nellie's ball has sent under a fence and she is vainly trying to recover it when Warner Pierce, a young cowboy, rides up and dismounting, retrieves the ball. The pompadour is attracted and the cowboy is made happy by an invitation to call.

The following day he presents himself at the hotel and meets Jimmy Morris, who intimates that Carl Jones, a wealthy widower, is paying Miss Pierce determines to see more of Nellie regardless of her father's objections and plans a time. He calls the tune of the "Circus Heavy" together and plans to hold up the limousine and kidnap his daughter and then send them to the mountains.

Accordingly Mr. Norris is held up by the cowwhile bandits, his daughter kidnapped, and he is left to the tender sympathies of the old and saddling widow.

The outlaws deliver Nellie to Warner and he "rescues" her from the bandits. Arrived at the scene of the holdup he returns the daughter to the distressed father, who is overcome with gratitude and invites the young man to call whenever he wishes.

Matters have progressed most favorably for him with the widow and he fears that several his daughter's acquaintance may be sooner than him love. The widow, as the sentimental compensate for the loss of his daughter.

THE COWPUNCHER.—Several times Joe had attempted into Jack was paying his sister too much attention, and now, he had actually caught the young man proposing to her. And he had sent him the house, and the quarrel which ensued between her so aroused was he at the latter, that it took to a fist words, when he later met Jack at the saloon to keep on a quarrel. This has stopped between them, however, when guns were drawn, and resulted in they fight with their fists.

Hot blooded they were that neither might have been dropped, but to be gotten the best of by one or his fellow's fists when he interfered, acting so at the son's suggestion. Jack was sold by the old man that as might go. Thus, the elder Summers ordered his son to leave, when, behind Jack telling his daughter good-bye, while Joe, his pride still wounded, mounted his horse and rode after the cowboy, determined to have their fight out with guns.

Upon the road, Ann beheld her brother's action, and shrewdly guessing the cause, ran for her horse and started after the pair. However, she was delayed a few minutes until Joe had succeeded in downing Jack to a draw, by striking the cowboy in the face with his hat, and the men were on the point of firing at each other, as Ann was heard from behind, and as the men turned in surprise, they beheld a band of Apache Indians, who had stolen upon them unawares.

Seeing that the others' exit was cut off Ann quickly dismounted and ran to the side of Jack, lying in one of the Indians gave chase, she returned to the ranch to safety. Then with her father and the cowboys she started on a wild race to the rescue of her brother and sweetheart, who meanwhile were also hotly pursued by the savages. Seeing the Indians somewhat at bay, and on the redskins could close in upon them, the rescue party opened upon the fall, scattering the Indians and not only bringing about a reconciliation between Joe and the Summers, but also to complete the happiness of Jack and Ann, who thus the family as a prospective brother and son-in-law.

THE LITTLE BURGLAR.—Irving Howard desired to wed his cousin and heir, Dora Judson and foreseeing such, therefore, insisted that his daughter should make her home with him after her marriage. Irving was coldly told by Dora plead for her husband. Judson remained firm, so after offering Irving enough money to take him West, which he refused with scorn, the young man departed determined to return and claim his wife and child.

Seizing the first train left, however than in going to claim the safe, the old gentleman discovered that several packages of money were missing. This then was the reason that his son-in-law had so grandly refused his aid. Quickly calling up the police station and Irving's description was sent out on the wire, and having a hack. His debtor was soon overtaken and, being arrested, Irving came in front of the prisoner and Judson was much surprised until Dora came running in behind the police station. Little Edgar had run her mother gave Irving some bills as an act of her grandfather's love was turned the child had helped himself to the money and was once more with her mother. Irving, Judson, Dora and Edgar were all happy.

So badly did Judson feel at the injustice he had done Irving that he insisted upon his remaining for the week and Irving accepted just to spend a little of his own time with his son-in-law in the evening.
